Kerry plan is best Israel can expect, Liberman says

Raphael Ahren
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Liberman said Sunday he won't agree to any peace deal with the Palestinians without the exchange of the "triangle" area southeast of Haifa, which is heavily populated by Israeli Arabs, for West Bank areas populated primarily by Jews, known as "settlement blocs."

He stressed that he backs the creation of a Palestinian state and appreciates the current efforts of U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry to reach a final status deal, but added that he would not accept an agreement that would allow "even one" Palestinian refugee to return to Israel.

He also said that Kerry's positions on the peace process, including his understanding of Israel's security needs and its demand to be recognized as a Jewish state, are the best offer Israel can expect from the international community.

Liberman spoke at the opening of the Foreign Ministry's ambassadors conference for heads of Israeli missions around the world. At the conference, which took place at Foreign Ministry headquarters in Jerusalem, Liberman sounded decidedly less hawkish than in recent years. He has insisted in the past that a peace agreement with the Palestinian Authority was unattainable and accused Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas of "political terrorism," but on Sunday he seemed to accept the idea that a Palestinian state will be created in the near future.

Federation outreach to Israelis starts to pay off

'They don't realize that if they don't work on it... their kids will not have the same identity'

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Despite ongoing efforts by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to integrate the city's 50,000 Israelis into the organized Jewish community, Galya Sarner, the federation's Israeli-Canadian Project director, said that although there have been many successes, there's still a long way to go.

"I think it's going to take time. We're not there yet," said the Israeli-born Sarner, who moved to Toronto in 2005, with her Canadian-born husband Robert – the director of communications for Roots Canada and a former Israel-based journalist and columnist for The CJN – and their three children.

After decades of exclusion and alienation from the Jewish community and its institutions that greeted the first waves of Israeli immigrants to the city, the federation, under the leadership of outgoing CEO and president Ted Sokolsky, has sought to make meaningful connections with Israelis in Toronto, Sarner told The CJN.

Due to a perception by Diaspora Jews and the Israeli government that leaving Israel went against the Zionist ideal of having strength in numbers in the Jewish State, Israelis were once made to feel shame for leaving their homeland.

Teen Gets Probation

WINNIPEG — A teen who tried to light a Jewish classmate's hair on fire and made anti-Semitic comments as he did so got 18 months supervised probation last week. The 17-year-old, who was 15 at the time of the November 2011 incident, singed the hair of his female victim, also 15. He pleaded guilty to assault with a weapon. The judge agreed the attack didn't appear to be racially motivated. The Crown called the boy a "jerk and bully." His lawyer said he didn't intend to light the girl's hair on fire, which occurred when she pulled away. The teens were friends and the boy apologized that day, court heard. The defence said his comments reflect how teens interact at their school and said others addressed her similarly.

Goldbloom Named

MONTREAL — Michael Goldbloom, principal and vice-chancellor of Bishop's University in Lennoxville, Que., has been named to the Order of Canada. He was among 90 appointments announced Dec. 30 by Gov. Gen. David Johnston. Goldbloom, 60, was cited "for establishing several transformative civic organizations in Montreal and for his dedication to building bridges between the city's English- and French-speaking communities." A labour lawyer, Goldbloom was previously publisher of Montreal's Gazette and the Toronto Star, and is now a member of The CJN's board. He's a former head of Alliance Quebec, an anglophone rights group, and chair of the Ville Marie Social Services Centre. .

Death Claim Denied

JERUSALEM — Israel denied a claim by one of its retired ex-ambassadors that it has killed most of those responsible for the 1994 bombing of the AMIA Jewish community building in Buenos Aires. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs dismissed the claim by Yitzhak Aviran, the envoy to Argentina from 1993 to 2000, saying they're "pure fantasy." He made the claim in an interview published Jan. 2 by the Jewish News Agency, or AJN, a Spanish-language service. Eighty-five people died in the 1994 suicide bombing at the multistory AMIA building and hundreds more were wounded.

Jewish Groups Oppose Proposed Charter

MONTREAL — Jewish groups have called for the withdrawal of Quebec's proposed charter of secular values in briefs submitted to the National Assembly.

Frank Dimant

Bill 60, tabled in November by the Parti Québécois government, is "a bad solution to a non-existent problem," the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and Federation CJA said in a joint brief.

"While no empirical studies have been used to demonstrate a decline in the secularism or religious neutrality of the state, the government is proposing serious restrictions to fundamental freedoms by banning the wearing of religious symbols in the public and para-public service, and possibly even in the private sector," the organizations say.

Public hearings on Bill 60 are slated to start Jan. 14.

The proposed law would discriminate against and marginalize members of minority faiths "by undermining the principle of state religious neutrality," CIJA and the federation believe, violating freedoms protected by the Canadian and Quebec human rights charters, as well as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

B'nai Brith Canada also argues that Bill 60 would have a detrimental effect on religious freedom and social cohesion. "The legislation will only serve to create divisions in Quebec society… [and] threatens the continuity of minority, religious and cultural groups in the province,"" said B'nai Brith CEO Frank Dimant.

Community steps up to help ice storm victims

CJN Staff

In response to the ice storm that struck the GTA in late December, a warming station was opened Dec. 22 at the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan, Ont. Overnight shelter for those in need was provided, as well as light snacks, beverages, hot coffee and water.

From Dec 22 to 24, a total of about 10 guests were there each day, including a young family of five and a senior woman.

The overnight shelter stopped receiving guest by about 8 p.m. Dec. 24, when the service was deemed no longer necessary.

Volunteers also helped deliver water and snacks to seniors trapped in their apartments along the Bathurst Street corridor from Finch to Steeles avenues – to people who had no power, no heat and no water, as the apartment pumps were down.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto received a call Monday night from Circle of Care about these seniors. By the next morning, the agency had determined which buildings needed help most, and it sent out the call for volunteers. By the afternoon, the necessary supplies were in the Lipa Green Building lobby. More than 150 volunteers lined up to collect the supplies and learn which buildings they were to cover. Most had to walk up the stairs (up to 16 floors), and they delivered the packages to 225 seniors in nine buildings

"Within hours of the storm taking hold, and despite the fact our central offices were shut down due to the power failure, UJA Federation's senior professional team convened regularly by conference call to assess the situation and provide leadership and support in whatever way we could," said Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO of the Toronto federation.

"Fortunately, our offsite computer and phone backup systems met their biggest challenge ever, working as planned for such emergencies, and we were able to remain in contact with each other, our partner agencies and the community. And wow did the community respond!"

UJA Federation set up a warming centre to help those in need during December's ice storm that struck the GTA in late December.

Iran and Turkey will stay in the news this year

As the New Year began, two of the Middle East's dominant stories from 2013 continued to unfold: Iran's nuclear and regional ambitions, and Turkey's passive response to the Iranian challenge. They are interrelated, but let's begin with the former.

Despite several rounds of talks in the intervening period to work out such fundamental "details" as a start date, the Nov. 24 Geneva agreement between the "P5+1" and Iran limiting Iran's nuclear enrichment program – in exchange for the easing of some economic sanctions – has still not been implemented.

Stories have circulated in Iranian media that the details might be ironed out by the end of this month, but nothing is clear.

On Jan. 1, AP reported that Iran has added "hardliners" to its negotiating team in an effort to placate critics of "moderates" such as President Hassan Rouhani and Foreign Minister Mohammad Zarif, who are leading the talks.

And, since Nov. 24, despite Tehran's denials, Iran has had a free hand to continue work on its nuclear weapons program.

It's not surprising, then, that a keen Mideast observer such as Jeffrey Goldberg wrote in his Dec. 31 Bloomberg column that it's nothing short of "astonishing" that "the Obama administration, and its European allies, have let more than a month slip by without actually getting this deal done."

According to Goldberg, 2013 was a very good year for Tehran: "Iran continues to be the most potent state sponsor of terrorism in the world; it is still the prime backer of Hezbollah in Lebanon and of the Bashar al-Assad regime in Syria; and it hasn't shown any inclination to actually roll back its nuclear program."

Iran has already benefited economically. As former Israeli ambassador to Washington Michael Oren explained to Times of Israel editor David Horovitz in an interview published Dec. 30, "[They] got a big bump on the rial. [They] got a jump in the stock market in Tehran. The message has gone out that the sanctions will not be tightened, which translates as you're loosening them. It is gain for the Iranians."

Oren continued: "Meanwhile, they're continuing to work on [the heavy water] Arak [facility]. Meanwhile, they continue to build and do research for the centrifuges… Weaponization is off the table. So the program in fact is progressing. Maybe they're not breaking the 20 per cent [enrichment] red line, but they're expanding out horizontally, and in depth in terms of the weaponization. The Iranians are gaining."

With respect to Turkey, the assumption that economically and militarily powerful Sunni Turkey would act as a natural counterforce to Shia Iran – which has been extending its tentacles from Shia-dominant Iraq through Syria and into Lebanon – has been upended. If anything, Turkey's Prime Minister Recep Erdogan has deepened his economic ties with Iran while forging energy deals with the autonomous Kurdish region of northern Iraq and the Iranian-backed central government in Baghdad. This has left wealthy, but otherwise ill-equipped, Saudi Arabia to challenge Iran's growing influence in the region by supporting rebel factions fighting Bashar Assad's Iranian-backed regime in Syria.

Erdogan is currently contending with the largest corruption scandal affecting his AK Party since it came to power in 2002. According to Gallia Lindenstrauss and Yaniv Avraham of Tel Aviv University's Institute for National Security Studies ("INSS Insight," Dec. 30): "Some of the corruption now exposed in Turkey involves trade relations between Turkey and Iran and the extensive use of Turkey by Iran to circumvent the economic sanctions, especially with regard to banking transactions."

Lindenstrauss and Avraham argue that these revelations will spark "international pressure on Turkey to reduce the scope of its economic ties with Iran." Still, that pressure is unlikely to have much effect.

While Israel has been trying to improve relations with Ankara (El Al flights to Turkey may resume this spring), such efforts have been buffeted by accusations in Turkish media outlets with close ties to Erdogan's ruling party that Israel, the "Jewish lobby," and the United States have been promoting rumours about Turkey's political corruption.

Paul Michaels is director of research and senior media relations with the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

POLLARD PETITION: Israeli MKs Nachman Shai, left, and Ayelet Shaked presented President Shimon Peres with a petition which he is to send to U.S. President Barack Obama. The petition which urges him to release Israeli spy Jonathan Pollard from U.S. federal prison, won backing from every faction of the Knesset. One hundred and six members of the Knesset signed the document at the close of a lengthy discussion of the Pollard issue on Jan. 1, which has come to the fore once again in the wake of recent disclosures of American spying on Israeli leaders. Stars of David win hockey championship

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Is it too early to refer to the Israeli Stars of David as a hockey dynasty?

Let's see – you've got the 1956-60 Montreal Canadiens. They were pretty good. There were the Leafs teams of the early 1960s. They won four Cups. The Islanders and the Habs later won four in a row and the Oilers hoisted Lord Stanley's silver-plated mug five times in seven years.

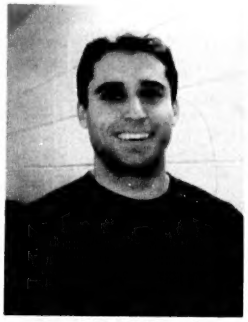
So when the Stars of David won their fourth title in six years in the Canadian Multicultural Hockey Championships, it pretty much qualified them to be mentioned with hockey's elite. Didn't it?

Removing tongue from cheek, it was undeniable that the Stars were the class of the annual winter hockey tournament, which brought together teams representing various Toronto ethnic communities.

The Stars defeated Japanese Arashi 6-0 in the Dec. 30 title game. They went 3-0 in the round-robin portion of the tournament, 2-0 in the playoffs, gave up five goals in five games, captured three of the top four spots in the scoring race and had one of its players, right winger and scoring leader Seth Klerer, named tournament MVP.

About 60 or 70 friends and family came out to watch the Stars' in the championship game, played at Chesswood Arena. The Stars dominated right from the start, drawing a penalty in the first 15 seconds and scoring moments later on the power play. They never looked back.

The Arashi, a strong skating team, barely dented the Stars' defence, hitting the post once late in the game when the result was not in doubt, but creating no sustained pressure.



Seth Klerer

The Stars, coached and managed by Alex Voihanski, looked like a well-oiled machine by comparison. They threw the puck around with tape to tape passes, broke up Arashi rushes at both blue-lines, were quick in transition and peppered the Arashi netminder with shot after shot, generating numerous chances on rebounds, which the goaltender generously provided. They had chances off the rush, on scrambles, off the cycle and on odd-man rushes.

"This is the best game we've ever played," Voihanski said in the subdued winner's dressing room afterward, as the boys enjoyed an adult beverage.

"I think we dominated. We played a really strong game. The early goal set the tone for the game. We just played a smart, strong defensive game. We didn't give them a sniff."

Though the Arashi were badly outclassed, the Stars were given a scare the night before in the semifinal by the Polish Hussars. Though they out-chanced and out-shot the Hussars by a three- or four-to-one margin, they won 4-3 thanks to a last minute goal, Voihanski said.

"It was a bang-bang goal," Voihanski said. "Thankfully, the hockey gods were on our side."

Only a few weeks before the tournament, Voihanski was wondering whether he'd bring together the guys to compete this year. But then, he started receiving phone calls. The core of the team, which has been together for five or six years, wanted to know when the games began.

Voihanski put together a team he considers the best of all the Stars' championship squads. What elevated this version of the Stars over previous incarnations was depth. They rolled three lines and had a deep defence corps, he said.

For Klerer, who played NCAA Division 1 hockey with Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute in Troy, N.Y., it was his first time suiting up for the Davids. "We're a pretty highly skilled team with three lines," he said. "We move the puck well."

Playing on a line with Alon Eizenman, who played for several years in the French professional league and was a member of the Israeli national team, and Adam Weinberg, the trio meshed immediately.

Defenceman Jordan Weinberg, the middle brother of three Weinbergs on the team, has played for the Stars for five of its six years at the tournament. In that, he's not alone.

Weinberg, who played Junior A for the North York Rangers, said "you've got to trust in your teammates. One of the advantages of playing for so many years is that everybody has a role. It's like a kibbutz. You do your job and it's knowing what you can accomplish. Nobody has to do too much."

Bryan Weinberg, a forward at York University, rounds out the family's brother act. But they weren't the only trio of brothers on the team. They were joined by the Schwartz brothers – Jesse (who'll play for the University of Connecticut next year), Noah and Brendan.

Other team members included Sergei Frenkel, who has played for the Israeli national team, Darryl Karpel, Thomas Zubrick, Jordan Klein, Aaron Stein, John Garbe and Daniel Mazour. They were backstopped by Jake DiDimenico, who plays for York University.

New year, same old story

Last Thursday, comatose former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon took a significant turn for the worse. And at virtually the same time, U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry landed in Israel for talks with its current prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. I'm sure the symbolism wasn't lost on anyone: a Mideast peace process on life-support, survival unlikely, just like the man who proved more than any Israeli or Palestinian leader since his tenure how far he would go in pursuit of peace.

In Jerusalem, Kerry spoke of "tough decisions" facing Israeli and Palestinian leaders, but neglected to mention that neither side appears willing to make them. Indeed, the days leading up to Kerry's 10th visit in pursuit of peace saw both sides blatantly undermine the process. The jubilation in the West Bank and Gaza at the return of 26 Palestinian prisoners, convicted killers among them, was disappointing, even if entirely predictable. Meanwhile, the Israeli government followed up the prisoner release by leaking plans for new construction in the West Bank and east Jerusalem. Kerry never stood a chance.

Guest Editorial

And then Sharon's condition deteriorated to critical: multiple vital organs ceased functioning, and family gathered at Tel Hashomer hospital by the bedside of a warrior engaged in his final battle. Talk quickly turned to Sharon's fighting spirit and astounding political transformation, and one couldn't help but compare him to the current main players in the peace process.

What stands out is that Netanyahu, Abbas and Kerry, and even U.S. President Barack Obama, all lack Sharon's fearlessness. He proved he was willing to stick his neck out for peace – none of them has done the same. Sharon's 2005 Gaza disengagement plan was difficult for Israel, but it was also bold and innovative. He did the riskiest thing he could – make the first move – and when the disengagement was over, most Israelis were still behind him. Sharon understood that making peace will always require "tough decisions," and instead of pushing them off until someone else blinked or it wasn't his problem anymore, he took action. Israelis trusted him because of that.

It's tempting to wonder if things would have been different had Sharon not fallen ill almost exactly six years ago. Maybe the Palestinians' puerile response to the Gaza pullout – stepping up rocket attacks, not to mention demolishing synagogues, torching greenhouses and looting homes – would have soured Israelis on making any more concessions in the vain hope of reciprocation.

Then again, maybe Sharon would have wrested something from Palestinian leaders. Maybe his conviction would have scared them into getting serious about peace or risk being left behind. And maybe we wouldn't still be locked in this stalemate.

January has only begun, but both sides need to show more courage if 2014 is to be the year Israelis and Palestinians finally make peace. Unfortunately, it seems more likely Netanyahu and Abbas will continue to play for time, posturing about lack of trust while at the same time fomenting that distrust – and while they stall, Kerry and Obama will keep pretending they're making headway.

New year, same old story. There is no one to bulldoze this process forward.

United Church must change focus

The United Church should really get out of the boycott business. ("Group mobilizes against United Church boycott," The CJN, Dec. 19.) After preaching hatred of Jews for nearly 2,000 years, the Christian church is hardly a neutral party. There are more than two million Canadians out of work and needing assistance. Why not help people here at home, rather than extending yourself 5,800 miles to a situation you may not fully understand.

Edward J. Farkas
Toronto

Silence doesn't defeat hatred

Josh Morry, a representative of the University of Manitoba Students' Union, might have history, logic, common sense and the moral high ground on his side in his efforts to call out Israel/Jew-hatred on his campus at U of M ("To protest or not to protest," The CJN, Dec. 26), but does that make his decision to counter Israel/Jew-hating lies a wise decision?

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) believes that all historical evidence showing that Jew-hatred rhetoric precedes Jew-hatred violence no longer applies.

But CIJA would be wiser to take notice of three important and irrefutable facts: First, Israel is more politically isolated than ever, facing numerous boycott resolutions from academics, student, teacher, union and church groups worldwide. Second, it was because of vocal advocacy that hundreds of thousands of Soviet Jews escaped persecution at home and helped bring an end to racial segregation in the United States and South Africa. Finally, there is no evidence showing the benefits of silence in the face of hate and lies.

Kudos to The CJN

I am writing to commend The CJN team for increasing your coverage of diverse Jews and Jewish communities in far away lands. It's imperative that we, Ashkenazi Jews in particular, but all Canadian Jews, start to realize that Jews come in all colours, have lived in every country on the planet and that emerging and re-emerging Jews need our support, beginning with recognition and inclusion.

The Nov. 28 edition really struck me, and I was so excited that I sent The CJN web link to friends all over the world, for there were no fewer than seven stories that dealt with diverse Jews. Amazing!

As chair of the Jewish diversity committee of Congregation Darchei Noam and now also founding president of the Canadian Friends of Kulanu, I commend you.

Andria Spindel

Lev Tahor responds

I read the editorial "Let's wait to pass judgment" (The CJN, Dec. 26), and I agree with every word.

If someone forces a person into marriage, it is a crime against humanity and against the Torah. If someone abuses a child, it is also a crime against humanity and against the Torah. If we know someone like this in our community, we will be the first to hold him responsible for his actions.

Regarding the kidnapping charges against Lev Tahor leader Shlomo Helbrans, there was no claim at all that the rabbi abducted a child. The charges only allege that the rabbi gave the child, who was running away from his mother, advice by phone on where to run.

While the legality of such action in New York is in doubt, the accuracy of the allegation is also in doubt, since it was denied by the child himself during a trial and he continues to deny it 20 years later, now that he is secular and has served in the Israeli army.

We would be more than happy if the court removed the publication ban from the court documents, so that every reporter can see the nonsense of these allegations. We are also always ready to co-operate fully with authorities.

Terror upsurge accompanies 'peace' talks – again

Alex Traiman
JNS.org

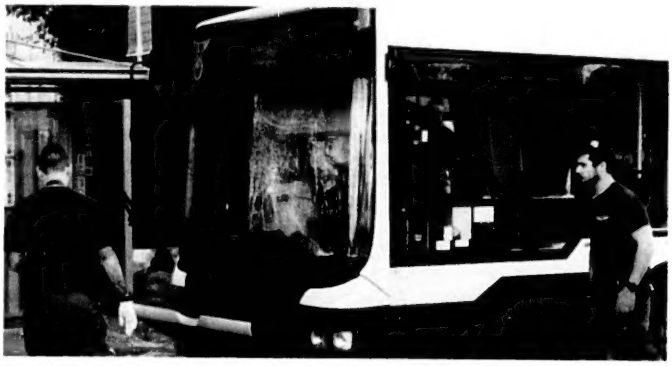
Upsurges in Palestinian terrorism have often accompanied progress – and eventual breakdowns – in Israeli-Palestinian conflict negotiations over the past 20 years. The latest round of talks, brokered by U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry, is proving to be no different.

Palestinian attacks on Jewish military and civilian targets have been on the rise since a Lebanese sniper killed an Israel Defence Forces soldier in mid-December. A civilian hired by the IDF was murdered Dec. 24 while repairing the Israel-Gaza border fence. A bomb exploded on an evacuated bus in the heavily populated city of Bat Yam, just south of Tel Aviv, on Dec. 22. A police officer was stabbed and moderately injured Dec. 23 while directing traffic at one of the West Bank's busiest intersections along the Ramallah bypass road, and Jewish drivers have reported several potentially deadly stoning attacks. In one of several recent Palestinian rocket attacks from Gaza that provoked Israeli retaliatory air strikes, one rocket landed near a bus stop used by schoolchildren near the city of Ashkelon.

"Unfortunately and regrettably, it's quite typical to the junctures in which political decisions and painful compromises are expected to be taken by the negotiating parties," Gilead Sher, who served as chief of staff and policy co-ordinator to Israel's former prime minister and defence minister Ehud Barak, told JNS.org regarding the uptick in Palestinian terror.

"Time and time again, we see the leash loosening for these kinds of acts, that typically characterize the Palestinian response to the kind of progress that seemingly is what is happening within the negotiating room," said Sher, who was a chief peace negotiator at the Camp David summit in 2000 and the Taba summit in 2001, in addition to taking part in several other extensive rounds of covert talks with the Palestinians.

Mark Regev, a spokesperson for Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, tweeted that the recent terror attacks "are a direct result of the incitement and hatred propagated in Palestinian schools and media." Regev added, "We are disappointed that so far [Palestinian Authority] President [Mahmoud] Abbas has not condemned these acts of terrorism, as one would expect from a partner in peace talks."



Israeli police and rescue personnel inspect the scene of an explosion on a passenger bus in Bat Yam, near Tel Aviv, on Dec. 22. The bomb was part of a recent upsurge in Palestinian terrorism. [Gideon Markowicz/Flash90 photo]

Sher, who currently serves as a senior researcher at Tel Aviv University's Institute for National Security Studies, told JNS.org that "[the recent terrorism is] intolerable, and I believe it has to be quite explicitly explained by the Americans and the international community to the heads of the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] and the PA that it is their responsibility and duty to subside those acts and to prohibit these kinds of acts emanating from their territory against Israeli civilian and military targets."

Sher added: "Israel has to do whatever it takes in order to counter those terrorist attacks, and at the same time, the government has a duty to pursue, explore whichever avenue possible in order to attain a two-state reality and a two-state solution, even if it is only a framework agreement or a partial agreement."

The rise in terrorism has stirred a heated debate among Israeli defence officials and parliamentarians about the need to continue pursuing U.S.-brokered Israeli-Palestinian conflict negotiations.

Israeli Economy Minister Naftali Bennett, head of the Jewish Home Party, said, "Israel is continuing with the diplomatic process as though there's no terror, while the Palestinians are continuing with the terror as though there's no diplomatic process."

Bennett echoed the messages of Netanyahu spokesperson Regev and Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon, attributing the attacks to Palestinian incitement.

"When you educate your children to terrorism from kindergarten, when your television broadcasts paint Jews as monsters, when even Tel Aviv is missing from your map – you're a terrorist," Bennett said in a statement.

Ya'alon stated, "As long as the Palestinian Authority continues instigation against the State of Israel and its citizens and does not encourage a culture of peace, we will be forced to deal with terror attacks. This is an intolerable state of affairs as we see it.

Responding particularly to the rocket attacks, Ya'alon added, "We will retaliate forcefully and painfully to this shock to our sovereignty and harm to our civilians and soldiers. If there is no peace in Israel, there will no peace in Gaza."

Labor MK Eitan Cabel warned that the violence – including the bus bombing – should not get in the way of current efforts to jumpstart talks with the Palestinians.

"We've been hearing about efforts to renew the diplomatic process," Cabel said. "Despite the bombing attempt, we must continue the process with all our energies."

Sher believes that while Israel is "always looking for as little collateral damage to the political process as possible," it "cannot by any means agree to have it in a way taken hostage or be handicapped in terms of its response and retaliation because there is a political process."

"These two elements should be completely separated," Sher told JNS.org.

Israel was planning to free 26 Palestinian terrorist prisoners this month in the third phase of a prisoner release it agreed to as a gesture to the PA for re-starting the current negotiations.

Deputy Defence Minister Danny Danon condemned the planned release amid the terror surge. "In a normal country, when a bus explodes on Sunday and a police officer is stabbed on Monday, you don't release terrorists as a 'gesture' the following week," Danon said.

Labor MK and former defence minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer countered that negotiations with the Palestinians are "an Israeli strategic interest," and said that Israel "must not let up in efforts to push the talks forward."

Meanwhile, the violence is doing little to increase the already-low confidence of Israelis that the latest U.S.-brokered talks will be more successful than previous rounds of diplomacy. A new Israel Hayom poll found that 85.8 per cent of respondents said the current negotiations would not lead to a peace deal.

"I personally don't think it has reached a level of violence that actually affects the confidence significantly. I don't think there is a lot of confidence anyway. I don't think there is a lot of trust in the first place, so there is not too much to harm," Sher told JNS.org.

"Having said that, we always take into consideration that the extremists will always try to affect the political process by means of violence and terrorism," he said. "It is intolerable, it is despicable, and there is no way to accept that. And we have to respond to it as though there is no connection between the violence and the negotiation process."

Harper's Israel itinerary: a modest proposal

Gil Troy
in Montreal

When Prime Minister Stephen Harper visits Israel this month, he can expect the usual political itinerary filled with ancient and eternal symbols such as the Western Wall, moving memorials like Yad Vashem and marathon meetings with politicians. Still, he should leave the beaten path, too, to learn about the meaning of Zionism as Jewish nationalism – because Jews are a people, not just a religion; to see Israeli democracy in action; to fix some Canadian diplomatic anomalies, and, most importantly, to see the wonderful partnerships that express the shared values uniting Israel and Canada.

Mr. Harper, beware: it's too easy to rush through your Israel trip without deepening your understanding of Israel, the Jewish People and Zionism. The Western Wall can feel like solely a religious site as you don a paper kippah and see everyone around you praying and swaying. Yad Vashem can make Israel seem only to be a response to the Holocaust. And meetings about the Palestinian problem and the Iranian nuclear threat can make Israel feel like one big embattled headache.

But that's not all Israel is.

To learn about the Jewish national past as the basis of today's nation state, perhaps Harper's security people could allow him to walk out of the crudely – but accurately – named Dung Gate and visit the City of David. The remains of a 3,000-year-old Davidic palace and the impressive water tunnel that King Hezekiah hewed through hard Jerusalem rock 2,700 years ago frame the Jewish story as one of kings making political and military decisions, not just priests and rabbis teaching religion and ethics. A visit to Jerusalem's Theodor Herzl Museum – not just Herzl's grave – or the Menachem Begin Center – will root the story of Zionism in 19th-century nationalism, again emphasizing Judaism's national dimension, which yearned for fulfilment by restoring this ancient displaced people to their historic homeland and building a modern state there, decades before the Holocaust.

Quick side trips either to the Jerusalem Venture Partner's Media Quarter or the PICO – People-Ideas-Community-Opportunities – creative work-and-think space in Talpiot will bring alive Israel's cutting-edge entrepreneurship and its unique position as the Altneuland, Old-New Land, fulfilling Herzl's dream.

To see Israeli democracy in action, Harper should wander around Jerusalem's colourful Machaneh Yehudah market, tasting Israel's diversity. There he can stop at a news kiosk, buy half a dozen Israeli newspapers, then sit at a cafe with a translator translating the headlines and the conversations around him. There he will experience a thriving pluralistic, multi-ethnic, poly-lingual democracy in action, even in a Jewish state that is 80 per cent Jewish.

Less fun, but equally necessary, is a tough managerial trip to the various Canadian diplomatic and NGO facilities, where he will confront civil servants who don't always follow his policies or share his vision on how to progress in the Middle East. All too often, these representatives of the Canadian people blatantly favour Palestinians, and even the occasional Palestinian rejectionist. Harper should insist that no Canadian diplomats or activists on the Canadian federal payroll undermine the careful, anti-terrorist, anti-anti-Zionist, pro-Israel and pro-peace approach he and his foreign minister, John Baird, have developed.

More fun will be seeing all the good that Canadians have done in Israel. In Jerusalem, let him scramble up my jogging path – the zigzag walkway leading up Mount Zion to Zion Gate, which was landscaped decades ago by the Canadian branch of the Jewish National Fund. In Tel Aviv, let him ride to the top of the Azrieli Center to see what one Polish-born Canadian-Israeli entrepreneur has achieved. And let him peruse the list of fellowships, scholarships, social welfare program and educational initiatives that Canadian philanthropists have sponsored. These for-profit and philanthropic initiatives are helping the world and building an important Canadian-Israeli bridge. Once inspired, the prime minister can push the Canada Revenue Agency to be more encouraging of these projects, many of which justifiably earn Canadian tax deductions, implicitly including the Canadian taxpayer in these humanitarian, globe-improving efforts.

There will inevitably be serious meetings with Israel's political leadership. But I also hope Harper has enough exposure to Israel in all its colour, grandeur and history.

I also hope he has enough contact with regular Israelis who want to give him a simple message, "Todah rabah," thank you, for standing tall and supporting Israel steadfastly, courageously and honourably.

The ice storm of 2013

The little reed, bending to the force of the wind, soon stood upright again when the storm had passed over. -Aesop

Urban Writer
Avrum Rosensweig

The storm of 2013: it was different for everyone. And yet, it was the same thing for all of us, a pivotal time in our lives.

The ice storm. Like all difficult situations, it required people to respond in a way that was mightier than the damage the fallen trees had created. We had to be brave and giving so as not to let the tumbled branches and torn wires win. Thus, throughout the course of that wicked weather, you would see individuals shovelling wooden debris off their property and that of their neighbours. Times were not normal, and the rules we generally follow – "You stay on your side, and I'll stay on mine" – were cast off.

Man-made borders were exactly that. Contrived. Thanks to the freezing cold winds.

During these times, we all become keepers of the story, archivists. All men, women and children now have a story to tell, an account of how they helped an old or unwell person stuck in his or her 20th-storey apartment, or how they draped their expensive quilted blanket over a suffering child.

The storm became an integral part of our city's and our country's narrative. We ask, "Where were you when the lights flickered and the maple trees fell? That question will stand tall forever.

It was quiet inside and out. A stench emanated from the refrigerator, and I was concerned about the well-being of my family and friends. On Day 2 of the ice storm, with no power, I was with my son and my mother, and I noticed that my mental state wasn't great. It was dark, pitch dark like the plague in Egypt, I told my son, as we manoeuvred the black stairwell. We took advantage of the weather, the very strange, different, inclement weather, to learn from it and understand our lives as they are today and how they might have been 150 years ago, when the day ended early because it was impossible to see.

Stories abound. A friend, a Holocaust survivor living on an affluent street affected terribly by the icy cold (proof that the elements are an equalizer) – told me the following as she waited on Day 5 for her lights to flicker on. "I was in Auschwitz for three years, and every winter was like this," she said, referring to the harshness of the wintry Polish countryside. "Yet, I had less clothes, I was hungry and I didn't know what tomorrow would bring. But somehow we survived."

(I was taken by the word "we." Often survivors will begin a story with "I" and end with "we.")

My elderly friend continued: "I thought about this during the ice storm, and it made things easier."

The ice storm of 2013 compelled us to think about such things. How did the men, women and children who survived the Holocaust do the marches in the frigid and damp winter days?

The ice storm of 2013 made friends of all of us. Arguments subsided. While the very naughty broke into the homes of the vulnerable and chilled, thefts were down, and in a strange way, joy was up.

We live in a place where we frequently don't know our neighbours, and that's sad. So when the lights go off, food is limited and our socks don't keep our feet warm enough, we warm our bones through the kindness and sharing of others.

As my son said: "Daddy, I really like this ice storm. I wish it happened all the time." And he did, because our neighbours opened their doors and learned the name of a man who lives three metres away from us.

The ice storm of 2013 was different for all of us, but the same thing for most – a time to experience something authentic – empathy and community.

If patience is worth anything, it must endure to the end of time. And a living faith will last in the midst of the blackest storm. -Mahatma Gandhi

Helping friends in their time of need

Joe Oliver

This year, as we celebrated Chanukah with friends and family, on the other side of the world, Typhoon Haiyan was gathering its destructive and menacing force in the Pacific Ocean. When it hit landfall in the Philippines, more than 6,000 people were killed (and 1,800 people are still unaccounted for), 16 million homes were damaged or destroyed, and hundreds of thousands of survivors suffered from a lack of water, food, and medicine. It was the deadliest typhoon to hit the Philippines in a long history of natural disasters.

In the face of this tragedy, with tremendous dignity, courage and faith, people on site rallied to rescue the trapped, help the injured, provide support to the homeless and rebuild their communities. I personally heard from many constituents about the tragic effects on families and loved ones in the Philippines.

The government of Canada played an important role in assisting Filipino Canadians as they struggled to cope with near-paralyzing worry for relatives and friends, their need for information and their desire to help. The government immediately pledged $5 million in aid. Soon after, Prime Minister Stephen Harper visited Our Lady of the Assumption Parish in Toronto, where he offered a further $15 million and pledged that the government would match donations made by individual Canadians to charitable organizations.

We quickly sent the Canadian Humanitarian Assistance Reconnaissance Team to the hardest-hit areas of the country to evaluate first-hand the widespread devastation. That was followed by the Canadian Forces' Disaster Assistance Response Team (DART), whose members were among the first responders to provide humanitarian assistance and disaster relief. Citizenship and Immigration Canada also pledged to prioritize immigration applications from those affected by the typhoon.

Canadians from across the country, including the Jewish community, responded with care and generosity. UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Philippines Typhoon Relief Fund will support the life-saving efforts of the federation's partner agency, the Israeli-based humanitarian organization IsraAID.

The relationship between the two communities is strong, with many Filipino Canadians living along the Bathurst Street corridor in Toronto. Our support is not only a matter of doing what is right. It's also saying thank you to the many caregivers from the Philippines who look after the sick, the elderly and the young.

Jews are renowned for extraordinary fundraising and other efforts for good causes. These contributions reflect our religious and moral commitment to tikkun olam, humanity's shared responsibility to heal, repair and transform the world. Acts of tzedakah save lives and repair broken communities. They represent gemilut chasadim, a mitzvah that an individual completes without the anticipation of receiving something in return. I am proud to be citizen of a country and a member of a community that contribute so much to help people in times of difficulty, well beyond our borders. It reflects the best of Canadian and Jewish values.

Proposed academy shelved

CJN Staff

MONTREAL — The English Montreal School Board (EMSB) has put "on hold" plans to open a high school in Côte St. Luc after failing to obtain minimal registration.

Wallenberg Academy, which the EMSB had hoped to open for the next school year, would have offered a Jewish heritage program, among other specialties, such as a sports concentration and enriched arts and language studies. Wallenberg was to have been located in the former Wagar High School, now called the Giovanni Palatucci Facility.

Commissioner Syd Wise, who spearheaded the project, said, "We have not reached the minimum number of students to comfortably begin an academic program in this location in September 2014." The plan was to begin with grades 7 and 8.

The EMSB hoped the creation of Wallenberg Academy, with its "concept" programming, would stem the decline in enrolment by attracting a new clientele, mainly away from private schools. He said that the EMSB continues to experience a "slow, but relentless, contraction" in registration, like the rest of the English public school system.

"This downward spiral in Anglo education cannot be acceptable without at least making an attempt to tackle the problem," Wise said. "We are struggling for linguistic survival and that means stopping the bleeding… Yet, we have had no major task force seriously studying the problem."

This past year, the EMSB lost 554 students, he said, and the number of school-aged children eligible for English education continues to shrink.

"The reality is if we are to survive as a major Anglo force in Montreal, we are in need of a number of Wallenberg-like concept schools to make ourselves more attractive to eligible Anglo students," said Wise, a former Wagar principal. "If we do nothing, then we will have failed the Anglo community."

Dividing a pension on divorce

Family Matters

Do you know anyone going through a divorce who may have a pension? Wonder how Ontario family law divides it on separation? Do you know whom to call to get the pension valued? Well, did you ever try cutting a diamond — it's about as tricky and valuable.

So to help answer such questions I invited an expert pension valuator, Mr. Mathew Krofchik of Krofchik Valuation Partners (Toronto), as my featured guest to assist in writing this. If you're still scratching your head you can contact me (see below) or Mr. Krofchik at matthew@kval.ca 416-922-9889. Their website address is www.kval.ca.

Once two spouses are separated, every pension needs to be valued in order to ensure a fair division of each spouse's marital property.

Figuring out whom you need to call to value a pension has become pretty complicated in recent years as a result of some new legislation. On January 1, 2012, a dramatic change in the way pension assets are calculated and divided between divorcing couples in Ontario came into effect. The "new rules", as they are commonly referred to, affect different pensions in different ways.

For example, pensions covered by the Ontario Pension and Benefits Act ("OPBA") like HOOPP, OMERS, and the Ontario Teachers' Pension Plan (or in other words, Ontario provincial pensions) require the pension administrator to complete the valuation for no more than $600 plus HST (some exceptions apply) and within a set time frame.

On the other hand, if you or your spouse are a member of a pension plan that operates at a nationwide level, like those available to federal public service employees or banks, the value of the pension is calculated using a formula set out in the new rules. One or both of the divorcing spouses or their lawyers can retain a professional pension valuator.

This is a markedly different approach than is required for Ontario pensions, where only the member or their spouse can apply to a pension administrator to have the subject pension valued. Common-law spouses cannot apply to a pension administrator to have the pension valued.

How do you figure out if the pension is provincial or federal?

The easiest way to figure this out is to contact the pension administrator and ask if the pension falls under the OPBA. If the answer is yes, proceed to ask them for the necessary forms to complete and then send them into the administrator. If the answer is no, ask for a pension statement for "family law" separation purposes, and give as close to the date of separation as possible and retain an independent pension valuation firm to value the pension.

So what are the major benefits to the new rules if the Pension is provincial?

Under pensions regulated under recent amendments to Ontario's Pension Benefits Act, divorcing spouses who are Provincial employees now have the option of transferring a percentage of the value of the member's pension in the form of a transfer from his/her pension plan to the non-member spouse's own registered pension plan, RSP or even within the same plan to his or her credit rather than having its value added to their net worth (calculated as of the date the parties separated) thereby (in many cases) having left the pension holder without any current cash or interest in the matrimonial home: i.e. by splitting a piece of the Pie directly from the Pie itself rather than taking its "value" and perversely prepaying the Pie's value from your current share of your home or savings. Federal employees have had this option for some time now.

This option was not available for separating spouses prior to the new rules coming into effect. Previously, non-member spouses could only receive their portion of their spouse's pension by calculating the entire value of the pension (after tax) and the non-member's share. Since the pension holder could only receive payment of his pension on retiring, the member would often be obliged to pay his/her spouse's share out as of the date of separation through the regular division of net family property (e.g., through a lump sum cash payment or some other trade-off such as, "you get the house and I'll keep my pension").

This would often lead to a very unfair result in situations where a middle-aged member had only an interest in a house, a pension and some investments/cash. Suddenly, on separation, he/she was obliged to pay out his spouse's share of his pension (often six figures) from his half-share of the equity in his home or his savings, even though he/she was not retiring for several years into the future!

Even with the change in the law, it's very important to know that this new ability to transfer an interest in a member's pension at source (i.e. from the pension itself) on separation to the non-member's own fund to avoid this injustice is only an "option". Spouses can still elect to split the pension the old fashioned way if they so agree. However, if the spouses can't agree on which option, the Court will decide at trial. In certain high conflict situations, the non-member would rather keep the house and leave the member spouse's pension intact when he/she retires, leaving the member with no equity in his/her house and perhaps little cash or investments as of the date they separated.

Finally, how are taxes dealt with?

Pensions do need to be valued net of taxes in most circumstances. Even though the new rules stipulate that pension administrators in respect of Provincial pensions must calculate the value of certain pensions, they do so on a pre-tax basis. Accordingly, even with Provincial pensions, firms such Krofchick Valuations are still often retained to calculate the taxes that need to be deducted in order to ensure an appropriate division of marital assets.

Montreal's Israeli community smaller, more well-established

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

Montreal's Israeli expatriate community – which is both more established than Toronto's and, at an estimated 8,000 to 10,000 people, much smaller – isn't the focus of any specific attention by Federation CJA here.

Daniel Malca, director of the Combined Jewish Appeal's Sephardic campaign, said the federation doesn't have any programs directed at Israelis, but he added that he has been "talking to many, many people" to see what their needs are, if any, and that the federation is in the initial stages of reaching out to the Israeli community.

Years ago, the YM-YWHA, a federation agency, ran Betsavta (together in Hebrew), an outreach program for Israelis.

Today, the main link between Israelis and the organized Jewish community is through the Hebrew cultural committee of the Jewish Public Library (JPL), which organizes occasional events in that language, including an annual theatre production, films and lectures.

The most regular activities for Israelis are organized by the Israeli consulate, under its Habayit Haisraeli (Israeli House) program.

Its director, Sefi Melchior, now in her third year in Montreal, notes that Habayit Haisraeli is sponsored by Israel's Ministry of Absorption, whose first goal is to help Israelis who want to return to Israel.

In other words, the objective is not to integrate them into the Montreal Jewish community.

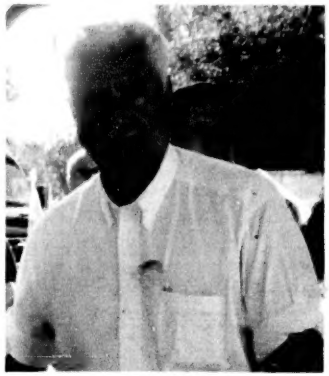
Melchior said she provides both practical assistance and emotional support to those considering going back to Israel. She said about 30 to 40 do so each year, and until a five-year program ended last year, many took advantage of special incentives offered by the Israeli government to former citizens.

Melchior is not sure how many emigrate here annually, as newcomers don't necessarily make themselves known to the consulate. "I don't know the numbers – [it's] not in the hundreds, maybe 20," she said.

Habayit Haisraeli tries to keep Israelis connected to their heritage through social and cultural activities organized throughout the year, such as holiday parties, storytelling for children, and, for teens, meetings through the Zionist youth group Hashomer Hatzair.

New is a discussion group for parents, she said, where they can express concerns about maintaining their children's Israeli identity abroad.

"I'm not here to necessarily convince people to go back to Israel, but I do want to help them keep this Israeli ingredient in their lives," Melchior said.



Arlazar Eliashiv

Some, she said, speak about feelings of guilt over leaving Israel, or regret over the loss of family ties, and she is there to listen to them.

Determining how many "Israelis" live in Montreal is difficult, as is defining who is Israeli, given that many, including Russians and North Africans, lived in Israel for short periods.

The consulate estimates that there are between 8,000 to 10,000 Israelis in the Montreal area, going by the number who come to renew passports, Melchior said.

In the federal government's 2011 National Household Survey, the voluntary questionnaire that replaced the census, 4,380 Montreal-area respondents listed Hebrew as their mother tongue, according to results made public last spring.

In recent years, there has not been a discernable influx of Israeli immigrants, and many of Montreal's Israelis have lived here for decades.

Melchior thinks Israelis do not really represent a "community" here, especially not among younger people.

"Those who have lived here 30 or 40 years have a stronger connection [with one another], they have more of a community, they have their own Israeli cultural events," she said. "Younger families do not go to these events."

Israeli-born Arlazar Eliashiv has lived in Montreal longer than he cared to pinpoint. He believes Israelis are generally well integrated into the Montreal Jewish community and don't need an organization of their own.

He pointed out that events geared toward Israelis are open to the wider Jewish community as well. When the JPL Hebrew cultural committee runs films or plays, they routinely feature English subtitles to encourage everyone to come to them.

Israelis now 'more and more integrated'

Today, both the federation and the Israeli government realize that the Israeli diaspora can be a benefit to Zionism.

"Israelis finally got recognition from the Israeli government saying… 'We do want you back in Israel… but we know that you have an important role in the Diaspora as ambassadors for the State of Israel. You do bring Israeli education to other countries. You can be the devek, the glue, that brings people together," Sarner said.

The beginning of the outreach effort, Sarner said, was a 2005 public apology by Sokolsky at the General Assembly of North American Jewish federations, held that year in Toronto, in which he asked for Israelis' forgiveness for what was seen as a paternalistic and distant attitude toward them in the past.

Israeli Scout troop

Today, Sarner said, with all the programming available at the Schwartz-Reisman Centre in Vaughan, which serves about 7,000 members, the community is moving in the right direction.

"We see Israelis more and more integrated into the federation. They have been taking on leadership roles. We care about their advice. We very, very much respect their leadership and [willingness] to volunteer," Sarner said.

"The last two years, I've been running a committee… called the Israeli Council, made up of a group of about 10 to 15 professionals. We share ideas, exchange ideas."

What makes Toronto's Israeli community outreach effort unique is the lead role the federation plays in creating and promoting programs that run under the Israeli-Canadian Project's cultural arm. By contrast, in most other North American centres with large Israeli populations, organizations that serve Israeli expatriates operate independently of local federations.

The Toronto effort has garnered attention: in November, it was one of a number of topics explored at a conference in New Jersey hosted by Moatza Mekomit, a newly formed umbrella organization for the New York area's Israeli community, together with the Jewish Agency for Israel, the Israeli Immigrant Absorption Ministry and the Israeli American Council.

Some of the successful programs running in Toronto include the Israeli Cinema Club, which presents Israeli movies with English subtitles; Yeadim, a leadership program in Hebrew for high school students that encourages participants to connect to their Israeli identity as well as the Toronto Jewish community; a cooking class called Taste Israel With Galya Sarner; and the Israeli Scouts of Toronto (Shevet Hermon), a program for students in grades 3 to 12.

"What keeps me going are the stories behind the stories, and when people come forward to say, 'Galya, I want to volunteer. I want to be part of it. I want to make a difference like you made a difference,'" she said.

During one Israeli Scouts event late last year, Sarner noticed that one of the volunteers – an Israeli mother whose daughter was taking part in the program – was crying.

"I asked her, 'Why are you crying?' She explained that her daughter was going to Associated [Hebrew Schools] – she was subsidized by UJA, but at a certain point, she still couldn't afford it, so she had to pull her daughter out.

"For some reason she wasn't connected to the Israeli community, but she heard about the Israeli Scouts. She said, 'I was lost… [But] this is how I was able to make new friends, reconnect to my Israeli roots… Whatever you need from me, just tell me and I'll be there,'" Sarner recalled her saying.

"I think this is something we created. We created an amazing sense of belonging, an amazing sense of a desire to be part of something, to reconnect to our roots."

There are likely hundreds of similar stories experienced by Israelis in Toronto, but Sara Dobner, volunteer chair of federation's Israeli Identity Program, said there are still many Israelis who aren't interested in integrating and skeptical about the federation's intentions.

"They think, 'They must want money, and we don't have money. We haven't been here for so many generations, and we're not going to give money so the federation can give money to [the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto] to pay for Jewish education when we can't even afford to send our kids to CHAT,'" Dobner said.

She said despite the ongoing outreach programs and the initial and subsequent apologies from Sokolsky, many Israelis still harbour resentment and anger.

There are also many cultural differences that Israelis find hard to grow accustomed to.

Dobner said when she first arrived in Toronto 26 years ago, "We didn't know how to live in a community – we never lived in a Jewish community. We lived in Israel. It's a state. It's not a community, so the whole concept of community life is very foreign…

"[Philanthropy] is also not part of our culture. In Israel, we didn't have to pay for Jewish education. We didn't have to pay for UJA. We didn't have to pay a 'Jewish tax,' because everything was included in our taxes," she said.

"Here, there is a cost [to living a Jewish life], and Israelis can't accept it," said Dobner, who also volunteers as a board of directors' member for TanenbaumCHAT, as well as an advisory board member for Kachol Lavan, the Israeli supplementary school.

Dobner said secular Israelis are also wary of programs that centre on religion, so the challenge is to help them realize the importance of exposing their children to Canadian Jewish culture, which is often religion-based.

"They don't realize that if they don't work on it… their kids will intermarry, their kids will not have the same identity as they think their kids will have. Speaking Hebrew is not enough. It is an important part of who we are, but it's not going to keep their Jewish identity," Dobner said.

"We can keep our connection to the Israeli community, but if our kids [don't integrate into the Canadian Jewish community], the battle is lost," she said, adding that her strategy is to create more programming that targets second- and third-generation Israelis.

The purpose of creating programming for Israeli families living in Canada is to help them hold on to their distinct identity while learning to embrace Canadian Jewish culture.

The Sarner and Dobner families are perfect examples of what that means.

"My children are literally Israeli-Canadian," Sarner said, referring to the fact they're equally influenced by their Canadian father and their Israeli mother.

Sara Dobner

"We have a daughter who made aliyah, but she won't lose her Canadian identity. I think she appreciates that she was exposed to both worlds."

Dobner said her daughters, 18 and 22, were both born in Toronto, but consider themselves both Israeli and Canadian.

She believes it was her decision to send their kids to Jewish schools and summer camps, as well as to live in a Jewish neighbourhood, while maintaining their Israeli identity by speaking Hebrew at home and visiting Israel frequently, that strengthened their connections to Israeli and Jewish-Canadian culture.

"Now I realize much more that the only way for Israelis to maintain anything for the second generation is to focus their efforts on integrating the second generation into the Jewish community."

Dobner believes it's more important than many Israeli immigrants realize that they enrol their kids in Jewish day school to better integrate into the Jewish community.

"I'd like to see more Israelis going to Jewish schools… The second thing I'd like to see is more Israeli events where Canadian Jews come and show interest," she said.

"It's really about an exchange – bringing Israel to our community and also learning how to be Jewish in the Diaspora from the community."

Sarner said she thinks Israelis living abroad are beginning to "understand and very much appreciate and respect the effort we make in creating very unique programs [to address their] cultural needs, educational needs, and social needs. They do very much understand that there is a serious effort to engage them."

'Israelis involved in Yom Ha'atzmaut rally

"The Israelis are not marginalized," he said. Quite a few Israelis, for example, are involved in organizing the annual downtown Yom Ha'atzmaut rally.

Eliashiv was principal of United Talmud Torahs and Herzliah High School, among the founders of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre, and is currently the president of the Canadian Zionist Federation, Eastern region.

He said the relatively modest Israeli presence in Montreal can't be compared to the one in Toronto or some U.S. cities.

Before asking the federation to support programming for Israelis, Eliashiv said it must be considered what the federation's expectations would be in return. "What is it that they [the federation] would want?"

The conquest and settlement of Canaan

Past Forward
Alex Gropper

The conquest and settlement of Canaan have been at the centre of controversy since the beginning of modern biblical studies. The Bible itself gives two accounts of the event. In the Book of Joshua, we have one version – a blitzkrieg-like rendition in which the Israelites sweep through the land destroying everything in sight under the charismatic leadership of Joshua.

In the Book of Judges, the portrayal of the conquest and settlement is a much longer, drawn-out event that lasts for almost two centuries. In the early days of the State of Israel, the blitzkrieg-like version was the one that held sway. It was the version favoured by the great scholar, statesman and military commander, Yigael Yadin, who was head of operations of the paramilitary Haganah in the War of Independence and later went on to become head of the Institute of Archaeology at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Yadin used his excavations at the famous site of Hazor, just north of the Sea of Galilee, to support his position. He found an enormous conflagration and destruction level at Hazor, which he attributed to Joshua.

The longer process of the Book of Judges was the one favoured by the German School of Tradition History, which emerged in the first half of the 20th century and was first espoused by two brilliant scholars, Albrecht Alt, and then Martin Noth. It was also the view that was favoured by Yadin's main scholastic rival in Israel, Yohanan Aharoni, who headed the Institute of Archaeology at the University of Tel Aviv.

Nevertheless it was the blitzlike account of the conquest and settlement of Israel that tended to prevail in both North America and Israel, thanks primarily to the influence of the great biblical scholar, W. F. Albright, whose pupils occupied many of the positions in biblical archeology in both North America and Israel. Chief among these was Albright's pupil and disciple, G. E. Wright, who held the chair at Harvard. However, by the 1970s the pendulum had begun to swing in the opposite direction.

A number of scholars in both Europe and North America were beginning to question the Albright School's literal interpretation of the biblical text. Among these scholars was Prof. John Van Seters who was teaching at the University of Toronto in the early 1970s.

Also interesting were a number of studies that appeared in North America and Israel in the 1980s. One of the two most fascinating of these was put forward by Baruch Halpern, who had been a pupil of Wright's at Harvard before teaching at York University in Toronto, and who went on to hold the chair at Penn State University. The other study was that of Israel Finkelstein, which grew out of his doctoral dissertation at Tel Aviv University. Both of these controversial works said that ancient Israel coalesced in the Judean highlands amongst people who had never left Canaan. It's a debate that continues to enthrall.

The spirituality of Tu b'Shvat

Midrashic Moments
Rachael Turkienicz

Tu b'Shvat is known in the Jewish world as the birthday of the trees. In today's environmentally sensitive world, it's wonderful to have a holiday that recognizes the importance of trees in the world. Jewishly, however, this isn't an environmental issue, but a strongly spiritual one.

Jewish environmentalism is expressed daily in the laws we have about how we are to treat and interact with nature. The holiday of Tu b'Shvat doesn't reflect how we treat the trees, but how we see ourselves in our roles and purpose on earth.

To understand the nuances of this spiritual approach, the sages refer us back to the beginnings of the book of Genesis. God creates the world and once that creation is completed, God plants a garden of beautiful trees, the Garden of Eden. In fact, the first human being is created and placed in the garden to be its gamekeeper. The only instruction given for the job includes both a positive and a negative. The positive is the commandment to guard and work the garden. The negative is the prohibition against eating one specific fruit from one specific tree. We all know how that ends.

From the moment we're created, our fates are connected with how we interact with trees. We're meant to protect them, and we're forever defined because we overstepped ourselves when helping ourselves to what they produce. Interestingly, the outcome of eating the forbidden fruit includes bringing death into the world, and yet we're unable to live without trees, since we breathe in what they breathe out.

Yet with all those physical and symbolic connections to the trees, the sages emphasize a more spiritual moment that transcends the physical. Again, returning to the book of Genesis, we observe God's actions. After creating the world, the first thing God does is plant a garden filled with trees. We're taught that when we enter the Land of Israel, we must plant trees as our first act of settlement. The moment that we're involved with a physically gruelling act – literally getting our hands dirty and sweating with labouring in the dirt –is simultaneously a moment of fulfilling ourselves as creatures in the image of God.

In fact, fulfilling our spiritual paths through involvement with the physical world is a beautiful ideal. Judaism isn't about finding spirituality by removing ourselves from the world. Rather, the challenge is to fulfil our spirituality by immersing ourselves in the world. Only in that way can we be active partners with God in completing the vision of creation. We learn the method by observing and imitating God. Judaism is about this world before it is about the next world.

This message is taught in the Talmud, which states that if we begin to plant a tree and someone tells us that the Messiah has finally arrived, we must first finish planting the tree and then go greet the Messiah.

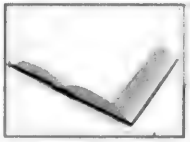
The Jewish journey for youth

Rabbi Jordan Helfman



Rabbinic Reflections

It's no wonder that Canadians are so passionate about Israel: shivering through a Canadian Tu b'Shvat (Jan. 16 this year) makes this holiday's interpretation as "Jewish Earth Day" seem less about environmental education than about a hope for global warming.

Similarly, there is no denying the warmth and beauty of a kabbalistic Tu b'Shvat seder, influencing a move in the sefirot (the 10 spheres of Kabbalah) from hard, earthly existence to spiritualism through the openness of white wine. But in Canada, when the seder ends and one steps outside, cold air slaps away all dreams of Yerushalayim shel malah (the spiritual Jerusalem). When we are again warm enough to reason, however, the first thought is a ticket to Yerushalayim shel matah (the earthly Jerusalem) via Ben-Gurion Airport.

Tu b'Shvat, historically, is a time for accounting in the land of Israel: it is the start of the tax year for tree fruit. So let us account for how we invest in the future of Israel and the Jewish People.

As Zionists, we are doing right by Israel by welcoming the Israelis that have joined our communities, visiting Israel and supporting the Jewish State both financially and politically.

Yet, we lag behind when it comes to our youth. Qualitative work on the success of youth movements demonstrate the power of articulating a Jewish journey that's expected of our youth as they mature into adulthood.

For many Diaspora Jewish communities outside of North America, the expected Jewish journey includes a nearly two-month trip to Israel in the summer after Grade 10 and seriously considering participation in an Israeli gap year program between high school and university.

In the United Kingdom, as part of this well-articulated community journey, the UJIA (United Jewish Israel Appeal) sends more than 50 per cent of Jewish 16-year-olds to Israel through youth movements.

While a high percentage of Jewish Canadians have visited Israel, there is nothing like the bonding experience of a peer trip. Our community recognizes this, through support of Birthright Israel. It's a mistake that instead of articulating the language of an expected Jewish journey, our community "saves itself" for a short trip without commitment. My own first trip to Israel was with Birthright, and I believe it is a fantastic program for catching those who are not on a clear journey to remind them of our Jewish home. But it should not be our communal default.

Teen Israel tours and gap year programs already exist – Young Judaea's Biluim sends around 75 teens a summer to Israel, and 14 of the 37 participants on Habonim Dror, North America's gap year program, are Canadian. Programs like these should be the communal expectation for all of our youth.

As our trees lie dormant, so do our expectations of a Jewish journey with a peer experience in Israel. But as we look at the seasonal burden that our trees bear, let this cold Tu b'Shvat remind us that with an investment in planning our children's Jewish journeys to Israel, soon, "Jacob will strike root, Israel will sprout and blossom, and the world will be full of fruit." (Isaiah 27:6)

What happened to the love?

From the Bimah
Rabbi Philip Scheim

In an early episode of the classic television sitcom All in the Family, Archie Bunker confronts his wife Edith's mood-swings, a result of her entering her "change of life" phase.

Out of character, Archie must respond to her volatility with kindness and restrain his frustration. He manages to control his temper for a while, but finally, unable to contain himself, he shouts: "If you're gonna have the change of life, you gotta do it right now. I'm gonna give you just 30 seconds. Now c'mon and change."

Edith responds to Archie's outburst with a smile, and says: "He loves me!"

I thought of this episode, which aired more than 40 years ago, when I received a phone call from a prominent rabbi in the haredi community, with whom, over the years, I have had pleasant encounters and whom I respect enormously. In his customary respectful tone, he proceeded to criticize me for a program in which I was involved, because of its problematic theological implications.

The more I reflect on the phone conversation, the more I have come to appreciate the rabbi for having called. Caring enough to criticize reflects a meaningful relationship. It would be easy for someone in the haredi world to ignore happenings in more liberal quarters of the Jewish community. The expression of concern, even criticism, reflects a love of amchah, of the wider Jewish world, a love that has the potential to break down walls of separation that too often prevent interaction.

One of my regrets is that there is so little connection between rabbis of different affiliations in our community. I fondly remember meetings of Toronto's rabbinic cabinet of State of Israel Bonds a decade or more ago, when Orthodox, Conservative and Reform rabbis would gather around the same table, share ideas regarding the High Holiday Bonds appeal and engage in discussion. Those meetings, in my case, led to long-lasting and meaningful relationships with prominent Orthodox rabbis, whose wisdom and friendship I value to this day.

Sadly, in the last several years, the annual gathering of the Bonds rabbinic cabinet has consisted only of Conservative rabbis. The precious interchange between right, left and centre in our rabbinic world that meant so much to me and many others has been relegated to history.

I fondly remember a heated exchange at one Bonds meeting between Reform's Rabbi Dow Marmur and the late Rabbi Moshe Burak, who was Orthodox. True, they were unlikely to agree on very much, given their positions so far apart on the Jewish spectrum. But that they would sit at the same table, even once a year, was good for the Jewish People.

We can argue, we can disagree, but as long as we're willing to talk to one another, we remain bound by the love that one Jew ought hold for the other, no matter where, how or when he or she prays.

I hope the day will again come when we rabbis can build relationships not only with those whose patterns of practice and ideology mirror our own, but even with those with whom we differ on significant aspects of Yiddishkeit.

Sometimes disagreement, argument and even anger can be an expression of love.

Sharon 'grave, but stable'

The Times of Israel

As of Sunday morning, former prime minister Ariel Sharon's condition had been stable for the previous 12 hours and his heartbeat and blood pressure were "good," Sheba Medical Center director Zeev Rotstein said.

"We knew he had a good heart, and now we know he has a strong heart," Rotstein said, but added that Sharon's life was still in "immediate danger" and there was no cause for optimism.

Sharon is "a true lion" who "continues to fight for his life," the hospital director added.

His family remained at his bedside, the hospital said, and former soldiers who fought alongside him were among the well-wishers who visited him during the day.

On Jan. 1, hospital personnel put out a laconic statement saying the comatose former leader's condition had taken a turn for the worse.

His family was at his bedside on Jan. 2, and his condition has since been defined as critical, with indications that he has at most a few days to live. Rotstein said Sunday that his family members were still at his side and the doctors were "treating him with all their might."

In his previous statement to the press on Jan. 3, Rotstein said the former PM was in critical condition and deteriorating, and continues suffering from continuous organ failure that may lead to critical damage to many bodily systems.

Doctors said Sharon, 85, who has been in a vegetative state since 2006, was suffering from renal failure that could lead to multiple organ system failure and death. Sharon has been hospitalized at Sheba, near Tel Aviv, for seven years.

The hospital director said last week that while Sharon's condition had "seen ups and downs" in the past 2-1/2 months, his life was now in danger.

"The danger [to Sharon's life] exists, [but] as we know, [Sharon] is a powerful man and has survived difficult situations during his time in our hospital," he continued. "I'm no prophet, but the feeling among the doctors treating him and the family by his side... is that he has taken a turn for the worse."

Rotstein added that Sharon wasn't receiving dialysis treatment for his kidney collapse, as it was not recommended for a patient with multiple organ failure. He said the ex-prime minister had received antibiotic treatment in recent weeks for infections that caused his condition to deteriorate.

"He is receiving all the treatments that a patient in his condition should receive," he said.

Visit cjnews.com for updates on Sharon's condition as they become available.

Pope to visit Israel in May

JTA

ROME — Pope Francis will visit Israel in May, along with Jordan and the West Bank.

The pontiff made the formal announcement of his long-anticipated trip from his Vatican window before a crowd who had gathered in St. Peter's Square on a rainy Sunday.

"In the climate of joy, typical of this Christmas season, I wish to announce that from 24 to 26 May next, God willing, I will make a pilgrimage to the Holy Land," he said after celebrating Mass.

Francis said he would visit Amman, Bethlehem and Jerusalem. The main purpose of the trip, he said, would be "to commemorate the meeting between Pope Paul VI and Patriarch Athenagoras" that took place 50 years ago, on Jan. 5, 1964.

Paul VI was the first pontiff to visit the Holy Land. Francis' two predecessors, John Paul II and Benedict XVII, both made pilgrimages to the region.

Francis said his trip would include "an ecumenical meeting held at the Church of the Holy Sepulchre with the representatives of all the Christian Churches of Jerusalem, together with Patriarch Bartholomew of Constantinople."

He added, "As of now, I ask you to pray for this pilgrimage."

There had been speculation for months that the trip would take place in the spring.

Francis had been officially invited to visit Israel on several occasions since he was elected pope in April, and he expressed his desire and intention to visit the Holy Land on more than one occasion.

Dec. 30 marked the 20th anniversary of the signing of the agreement that established diplomatic relations between the Holy See and Israel.

African migrants march on Tel Aviv embassies

JTA

TEL AVIV — Thousands of asylum-seeking African migrants marched on foreign embassies in Tel Aviv, asking them to pressure Israel to consider their refugee requests and release those in prison.

At least 2,000 protesters demonstrated Monday in front of the United States embassy in Tel Aviv, and hundreds of others in front of the embassies of France, Britain, Canada, Romania, Sweden, Italy and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, or UNHCR, among others, according to reports.

The protesters, mostly from Sudan and Eritrea, reportedly handed a letter to U.S. Ambassador Dan Shapiro asking him to convince the U.S. government to intercede on their behalf. Israel contends that most of the asylum seekers are economic refugees.

The African migrants were on the second day of a three-day strike. On Sunday, thousands of African migrants and their supporters demonstrated in Tel Aviv's Rabin Square and hundreds more protested in front of the Interior Ministry offices in Eilat.

The larger protests follow two weeks of smaller demonstrations.

Last month, the Knesset approved an amendment to the Migrant Law to allow Israel to hold African migrants in prison for up to a year without trial and indefinitely in the open detention facility in Holon.

The Holon residence is called an "open facility," with detainees free to leave during the day and with mandatory check-in at night. They are not allowed to hold jobs.

Israel's Supreme Court had ruled unconstitutional the law allowing officials to hold migrants without trial for three years.

Chassidic landlord found dead

JTA

NEW YORK — The New York Post is under fire for a cover story about the murder of chassidic landlord Menachem Stark.

"Who Didn't Want Him Dead?" blared the headline of the Sunday edition, next to a photo of Stark wearing a large shtreimi and graying side curls.

The story said Stark "had so many enemies that investigators say they almost don't know where to start looking."

It cited an unnamed law-enforcement source as saying Stark, a 39-year-old father of eight, was involved in several "shady" real-estate deals and was in debt.

Stark's body was found on Jan. 3 on suburban Long Island some 16 miles away from his Williamsburg office, from where he was kidnapped the previous evening. He reportedly was suffocated before his body was placed in the dumpster outside a Great Neck gas station and burned, according to police.

Video footage taken from his office showed Stark being taken into a van after a struggle outside his office in heavily Satmar Williamsburg. The identity of his abductors is not known.

Local politicians, including State Senator Simcha Felder and New York City Council Member Stephen Levin, urged the Post to apologize, as did Jewish media outlets. Many reportedlty threatened to cancel their subscriptions to the newspaper and to organize a boycott of it.

Stark's brother-in-law, Abraham Buxbaum, speaking on behalf of the family, told the Algemeiner newspaper that the headline was "disgusting."

He added: "Apologies won't help, the damage is done, I think," he added.

"The Post does not say Mr. Stark deserved to die, but our reporting showed that he had many enemies, which may have led to the commission of this terrible crime," the paper said in a statement, in response to the criticism. "Our thoughts and prayers are with the family at this time of loss."

Public records show Stark has a string of foreclosures and a $1.3-million judgment against him, according to reports. A police source told the New York Daily News that he "had many enemies." Some have accused him of being a slumlord, according to the paper.

Thousands attended his funeral last Saturday night in the Williamsburg neighbourhood of Brooklyn. Most of the mourners were Satmar Chassidim.

He was remembered by friends and relatives as a "go-to guy" and for being very charitable, as well as for his warmth and sense of family.

Liberman rejects any 'right of return'

"It's appropriate to talk about an issue that is not exactly politically correct," Liberman said in a lengthy foreign policy address. "I'm talking, of course, of the exchange of territory and populations. And if someone thinks that I'm talking about an exchange of territory and 'the triangle' and Wadi Ara [both are mostly populated by Israeli Arabs] – indeed, that's what I am referring to."

His party, Yisrael Beitenu, will not agree to a peace agreement unless it includes such a territorial exchange, which would place a large portion of Israel's Arab population centres within the future Palestinian state, and most of the West Bank's Jews within the Jewish state. Liberman emphasized that he was not talking about a population transfer. "Everyone will stay in their own houses, in the same places. Just the borders will move toward what is today Route 6 [the highway along Israel's eastern spine], more or less."

The redrawing of Israel's borders to exclude major Arab population areas now on the Israeli side of the Green Line and populated by longtime Israeli citizens, has long been Liberman's policy. In the past, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has rejected this approach.

The area known as "the triangle," located in the Sharon plain, contains mostly Arab-populated towns including Kafr Qara, Umm al-Fahm, Tayibe and Qalansawe. It was to have come under Jordanian rule in the arrangements that saw the establishment of the State of Israel, but was ultimately included in Israeli sovereign territory under the 1949 armistice agreements because of Israeli security demands. Israel instead ceded territory that had been earmarked for Israeli sovereignty in the area of the southern Hebron hills.

Last week, unnamed sources told Ma'ariv that the "triangle" plan, involving some 300,000 Israeli Arabs living on land that would become part of a new Palestine, had come up during talks between Israel and U.S. officials at various levels, including at least one occasion when very senior officials, Kerry among them, were in attendance. Israeli legal officials have begun investigating legal aspects of such an arrangement, the newspaper said. It added that the Americans have apparently not agreed to the idea, and that the Palestinians are likely to reject it.

The idea is aimed at addressing two central issues in a possible peace agreement: first, land swaps between Israel and a Palestinian state would enable Israel to expand its sovereignty to encompass major West Bank settlements, while compensating the Palestinians with territory that is currently part of sovereign Israel; and second, preserving Israel's Jewish majority.

Liberman on Sunday also warned of millions of Palestinian refugees who would move to a Palestinian state as soon as it is created. "There's no doubt that the Palestinians who today live in Lebanon, Syria and Jordan will all consider moving to the Palestinian state," he said.

Currently, some 2.4 million Palestinians live in the West Bank, with almost three million in the three countries he mentioned. "Let's take into consideration that the Palestinian economy is not like the economy of Switzerland or Norway," he said. "They need to live and work somewhere. What will happen then? What kind of pressure will be exerted on Israel then?"

Liberman said he rejects a Palestinian "right of return," even on a theoretical basis. "I will not sign any agreement that includes any right of return into Israel, not even a single person. Because if you keep that option open, even theoretically or on a limited scale, it will invite a lot of pressure. And this pressure will be very heavy."

It's important to look at the day after the signing of a possible peace deal, he said.

"It is important [to know] if we can live with the pressure that will be exerted on us, from outside and from within. Will a signature on the agreement with the Palestinians bring about an end to pressure on Israel from international community, or instead of so-called settlements, will those who criticize us over the settlements find something else to pressure us about?" Liberman said.

The people who decry Israel over settlement expansion are preparing to challenge Israel on other issues, such as the Bedouin or Israel's Jewish communities in the Galilee, he added.

"It's clear that they are not about to calm down. Even if we sign a peace agreement and the issue with the settlements is solved, they're already preparing the next issues."

Liberman praised Kerry for his efforts to bring Israelis and Palestinians to sign a final deal, and said the talks are valuable, even if they don't lead to a deal. While he said Israel needs to look for other partners across the globe, Jerusalem's relations with the United States are the "cornerstone" of Israel's foreign policy.

Reform rabbis get gov't salaries

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israeli government money was transferred for the first time to the Reform movement in Israel to pay the salaries of four community Reform rabbis.

The transfer of more than $86,000 on Jan. 1 comes 18 months after Israel's Supreme Court approved an arrangement to enable non-Orthodox rabbis who lead congregations to receive state salaries like their Orthodox counterparts.

The money was paid by the Culture and Sport Ministry, however, instead of the Religious Services Ministry, according to the Times of Israel.

Under the agreement, Reform and Conservative rabbis in Israel's regional councils, but not in large cities where most serve, will be recognized as "rabbis of non-Orthodox communities" and will receive wages equal to those of their Orthodox counterparts.

In addition, the rabbis must work full-time and be present at their congregation for at least 40 Sabbaths each year. Only rabbis of congregations with at least 250 members can receive full-time pay. Those leading congregations of 50 to 250 members may receive half a salary, even though they'd be required to work full-time.

Prior to the deal, sparked by a lawsuit filed in 2005 by Rabbi Miri Gold, only Orthodox rabbis received state funding.

"This is a historic and important step in the long struggle toward pluralism, religious freedom and the recognition by the State of Israel of all branches of Judaism," Rabbi Gilad Kariv, director of the Reform movement in Israel, told Ha'aretz. "The Reform movement will continue to act to redefine the relationship between religion and state in Israel and to separate the religious establishment from the authorities. However, as long as the state continues to fund religious services and the salaries of rabbis, we will make sure that this is done on an egalitarian basis."

Doctor's pic-sharing app aids in diagnoses

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Imagine you're a doctor and a patient comes in to show you a strange rash. You think you know what it is, but you're not entirely sure. What do you do next?

Joshua Landy is hoping that you'll turn to Figure 1, an app that has been described as Instagram for doctors.

Landy says that's a bit of an oversimplification, but it gives you an idea of what it's like – minus the Instagram filters. Doctors can share photos of their patients to educate other doctors, or to ask for comments and advice.

Landy, a Toronto-based physician, says he noticed that doctors across the continent were sharing photos of patients, asking for help or trying to learn from one another.

"If you look across North America, you can see this is happening everywhere, tens of thousands of times every day," he says.

The app, created by Figure 1 Inc., a start-up led by Landy, 33, and two partners, simply gives these doctors a place to share those photos in a way that's safe for both doctors and patients, as well as very easy to do. Doctors can just snap a photo and share it, attaching hashtags to it to help others find it in searches.

One of the most obvious questions that go along with this app is about patient confidentiality. How can you share photos of patients while keeping their identity and health-care information safe?

Landy says his app makes it easy, with automatic face detection and a feature that allows users to click on any part of the screen to obscure the image. It also reminds doctors each time they post to cover up any identifying features that are not automatically censored, like tattoos.

"We turned to a specialty health-care law firm in Toronto and one in Boston. What we found was, if you remove all the identifying information from the pictures, then yes, you can [share photos]," he says.

Landy isn't the only one who sees a need for this app. Figure 1 recently raised seed funding to the tune of $2 million. The funding round was co-led by Version One Ventures and Rho Canada Ventures.

"That's what is giving us our runway for the next year or year and a half," Landy says, explaining that the money covers the company's operation costs and the salaries for all 10 employees.

Although he says there are many ways the app can earn money, he's not ready to share any of the ideas. The focus right now is on development, and the monetization will come later.

Right now, the program is only available for iPhones and other devices running iOS, but Landy says thanks to the seed money, it will soon be available on Android devices, as well as on the web, so doctors will be able to use the programs while sitting at their desks in their offices.

The other limitation at the moment is that only licensed physicians can post photos and comments. That ensures the photos are accurately described and the advice is genuine, he says. However, anybody can use the app to browse and search through photos and read comments for educational purposes, and he says he hopes to expand the app to give allowances to non-physician health-care providers.

The medical community has so far responded well to the app, Landy says.

"There are people seeing patients and trying to answer questions and find knowledge any time of the day," he says.

"Even when I'm working in the middle of the night… I see there are many people also working through the night on difficult cases.

"There's this medical community out there, and I feel part of it."

The health-care industry tends to take much longer to adapt to new technology than the general population, he says, so he was thrilled when he saw how fast health care professionals were downloading and joining the Figure 1 community. In just over seven months, tens of thousands of users have used the program.

"It was quite exciting for us to see how open the medical community was embracing something like this," Landy says, crediting the success to the fact that the program doesn't ask doctors to do anything new.

"We're saying, 'You're already using pictures. You should do it in a way that's safe and in a way that helps other people.'

"That's the ethos behind our community."

Propulsion deal brings Israel one step closer to moon landing

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Israel's moonshot project is a lot closer to reality after the SpaceIL organization, which is developing the Israeli spacecraft that will journey to the moon in 2015, acquired the engine for the rocket that will blast Israel's lunar lander into space.

The propulsion system, produced by Israel Aircraft Industries (IAI), cost several million dollars and is "among the most critical components of the project," SpaceIL stated.

SpaceIL is a non-profit Israeli organization, established by a multidisciplinary team of Israeli space enthusiasts, that is building a "blue and white" spacecraft to compete in Google's big Lunar X contest. Google promises to award $30 million (US) to a team that can land an unmanned, robotic craft on the moon before the Dec. 31, 2015 deadline. Once there, the craft will need to carry out several missions, such as take high-definition video and beam it back to earth, and explore the surface of the moon by moving or sending out a vehicle that will move 500 metres along the surface.

SpaceIL's mission, as the organization describes it, is to successfully build, launch into space and softly land on the moon a space capsule, making Israel the fourth country in the world to achieve the feat. More than 250 volunteers are working on SpaceIL and the project has numerous corporate and academic sponsors. Most notable is Israeli telecom giant Bezeq, which, besides helping with the funding, is providing optical fibre technology that will transmit the entire drama back to earth. The money, said SpaceIL, will be used largely to help fund scientific education in Israel.

SpaceIL is one of 18 teams from around the world taking part in the race to land a privately funded spacecraft on the moon. They're seeking to take home not only the prize but the national glory that comes from landing a probe on the moon.

Israel's "secret sauce," said SpaceIL, will be the probe's light weight. The entire thing will weigh less than 150 kilograms (330 pounds). The probe itself – the only part of the craft that will actually reach the moon – will weigh no more than 40 kilos (88 pounds), with the rest taken up by the engines and fuel tanks.

It's a long way to the moon, though – 384,000 kilometres – so to save on fuel and weight, the SpaceIL craft will hitch a ride with a commercial satellite rocket that will take it beyond the atmosphere, ejecting it after passing the earth's field of gravity. SpaceIL is currently discussing several launch possibilities, it said.

Its craft won't just be very light, it will be very small, as well. The probe will measure less than a metre long, making it the smallest probe ever to hit the lunar surface. Though small in volume, the probe will be rich in technology, with advanced cameras, computers, and recording equipment installed to record the adventure and transmit data back to earth.

Revisiting the writer of When Harry Met Sally

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

The Most of Nora Ephron
Alfred A. Knopf

A year and some months after her death at age 71, the legacy of American screenwriter, journalist and blogger Nora Ephron is being spotlighted in The Most of Nora Ephron, a 560-page volume from publisher Alfred A. Knopf that presents some of her best writing.

What drew me to this attractively designed book was Ephron's masterful talent as a writer of commercially successful romantic comedies for the movies – When Harry Met Sally... (1989), Sleepless in Seattle (1993) and You've Got Mail (1998). She also whipped together Julie & Julia (2009), an entertaining soufflé about famous chef Julia Child that features a stunning performance by Meryl Streep.

Ephron was the daughter of New York screenwriters Henry and Phoebe Ephron, who wrote numerous Hollywood films in the 1940s and 1950s. One of four daughters, she grew up in close proximity to many famous people including Dorothy Parker and Lillian Hellman, both of whom she writes about in this wide-ranging anthology. (Her sisters also became screenwriters and writers.)

She was married three times, most famously to Watergate investigative reporter Carl Bernstein (husband number 2). Pregnant with his child, she discovered he was having an affair, and turned the sordid divorce that ensued into a winning novel, Heartburn, which later became a popular movie; the novel is reproduced here in its entirety. So is the screenplay of When Harry Met Sally..., the recent play Lucky Guy, and dozens of articles from diverse sources.

Perhaps the surest advice her mother ever gave her was: "Everything is copy." Ephron has put this sage wisdom into practice at every phase of her career: as writer and editor for Esquire and as freelance reporter, playwright and blogger for the Huffington Post. She first attempted screenwriting when her then-husband and his partner Bob Woodward asked her to rewrite William Goldman's script about the Watergate saga, All the President's Men. Her version was ultimately rejected but led nonetheless to more movie script work for television.

(Ephron was one of few people in America who knew the identity of Deep Throat, the reporters' secret source in the Watergate scandal. Although she revealed the name publicly on several occasions, "No one, apart from my sons, believed me," she would later write.)

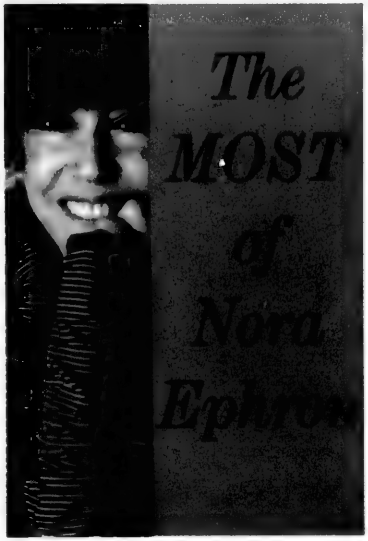
Happily, the movie When Harry Met Sally... holds up well after the passage of almost a quarter century, and reading the screenplay is a joy. Like much in The Most, it seems very much a product of its times – the self-obsessed '80s and '90s – but also possesses certain universal elements. Much of its humour comes from its exploration of the question of whether men and women can be friends.

In many ways, When Harry Met Sally... is the closest thing to a Woody Allen movie without actually being one. The titles are in the Woody Allen style, the backdrop is New York and the soundtrack consists of American jazz standards. The characters, smart and chatty and part of the media elite, talk incessantly about themselves and their relationships and little else.

In a very interesting afterword to the screenplay, Ephron explains that although it has her name on it, much of it arose as a result of creative collaboration between herself, director Rob Reiner, producer Andrew Scheinman and actors Billy Crystal and Meg Ryan. (She modelled "Harry" after Reiner and "Sally" after herself.)

The famous "fake orgasm" scene in Katz's Delicatessen, for example, which culminated in what the New York Times judged to be "one of the most memorably funny lines in movie history," was the product of such a collaboration. At first, the scene was supposed to be only a conversation between the two principles. But during an actors' reading, Meg Ryan, playing Sally, suggested that she actually fake an orgasm in the deli; then Billy Crystal, playing Harry, suggested that a nearby woman customer, seeing Sally's display, tell a waiter, "I'll have what she's having." It was one of "dozens of funny lines" that Crystal added to the script, Ephron reports.

Ephron has a genuine knack for seeing the falseness in the way we sometimes behave, and poking delicious fun at social pretension. In her piece I Feel Bad About My Neck, she explains that it's best to pretend not to know what friends are talking about when they refer in displeasure to the "little pouches under their eyes, or jowls, or wrinkles, or flab around the middle," even if one agrees that Botox or liposuction or a facelift is definitely required.



"My experience is that 'I don't know what you're talking about' is code for 'I see what you mean, but if you think you're going to trap me into engaging on this subject, you're crazy.'"

This is the equivalent to the balcony scene in Annie Hall, when subtitles tell us the real meaning of the dialogue between Woody Allen and Diane Keaton. It works because Ephron, like Allen, is decoding social behaviour in a humorous way, and writing about all of us, not just herself.

The Most is divided into nine sections categorizing Ephron's pieces by subject, genre and chronology. Ephron was a lifelong cooking enthusiast and indulged her passion frequently in her writing, even passing along recipes in her novel Heartburn, many of her blogs, and, of course, Julie & Julia. She once wrote that although she was Jewish, her religion was essentially, "One cannot use too much butter." She adored former U.S. president Bill Clinton, despised George W. Bush, and often soapboxed for progressive liberal causes. Her overriding interest in affairs of the heart and hearth, not to mention political feminism, seems to define her as a women's writer reaching out, especially in her smaller pieces, mainly to a sisterhood of readers.

For me, The Most delivers too much of a good thing, as a number of its offerings do not stand up well. With the retrospect of time, some indeed seem trivial or terribly outdated: for instance, does anyone really care any more about Julie Nixon Eisenhower? Ephron deserves to be remembered and celebrated mostly for her various larger contributions that clearly seem to pass the test of time.

Online journal for first-rate writers of Jewish stories

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

Nora Gold was a storyteller from the time she was very little. She can remember the time when she was six years old, sitting on the floor of her living room and making up stories for her family. Today, Gold is awaiting the publication of her first novel, Fields of Exile, about a student combating anti-Israelism at a university.

In response to many years of trying to get her stories onto bookshelves, Gold began jewishfiction.net, an online journal for first-rate writers telling inherently Jewish stories.

"Jewish fiction is considered by many a kind of niche writing," Gold says. "It puts many writers of Jewish fiction in a very difficult position, and I wanted to do something about that.

"People [have either stopped writing] or their work is getting lost, it's sitting in their drawers. I wanted to be able to support first-rate Jewish fiction and Jewish writers. I didn't want people to feel there's nowhere for them."

Nora Gold

It is currently the only English-language journal in the world devoted to publishing Jewish fiction, and it is free to sign up. Gold launched the site in 2010 and writers can send works of up to 6,000 words.

The story they submit must be "Jewish," in that it deals extensively with Jewish characters, history, identity or experiences. Gold says that a story is considered Jewish to her if there would be nothing left without this Jewish content.

Since launching the site, Gold and her small team of manuscript reviewers have read thousands of stories. She estimates that writers submit around 50 new stories a month.

The site's 12th issue came out on Dec. 3. The stories are either originally written in English or translated into English from another language. To date, stories from 12 languages have appeared on the site, including Russian, Turkish, Serbian, Croatian, Yiddish and Hebrew.

"The diversity of our journal is one of the things that I'm proud of," Gold says. "Everything we publish has never before been published in English." She adds that the work coming in from around the world come from a variety of perspectives: left wing and right wing; Israeli and from the Diaspora; from gay and straight writers; as well as authors known and unknown.

Jewishfiction.net has published close to 200 works of short fiction since its launch.

Although the site draws some of the biggest Jewish authors – including Elie Wiesel, A.B. Yehoshua and Chava Rosenfarb, nobody is paid for their work.

"This is entirely a labour of love. Everybody working on it does so on a volunteer basis, me included," Gold says, explaining that the site subsists on donations but that the only person paid for their work is the website technician.

Gold is also an Israeli citizen and does a lot of volunteer work and activism when she visits. Fields of Exile came out of the anti-Israelism she noticed after returning to Canada in the early 1980s, after spending six years in Israel.

"I saw things out of one eye as a Canadian Jew and out of my other eye, I saw everything as an Israeli," Gold says.

Before starting Fields of Exile, she conducted a nationwide study of Canadian Jewish women, exploring their experiences of anti-Semitism and sexism. She says that without this research, Fields of Exile, which will come out in May, would be a much different book.

"Nothing is lost on a writer," she says. "I really couldn't have written this novel without all that background."

Gold's first book, Marrow and Other Stories, won a Canadian Jewish Book Award. She is also looking for a publisher for another novel, The Dead Man, which is set in Jerusalem.

Beyond her writing, she is a community activist for Jewish and women's issues. In Israel, she is on the board of the Dafna Fund, an organization that helps advance women's rights and positions within Israel.

Gold, who lives in Toronto, collaborates closely with publishing houses in the United Kingdom and the United States. This collaboration ensures that jewishfiction.net often publishes novel excerpts from upcoming books before they are released.

She is now in discussions with Canadian publishers, hoping that more national writers will submit works for the site. She hopes that more Jewish-Canadian voices can come to the fore and help to bridge connections between other Jewish writers around the world.

"It's a particular joy for me to be able to help foster and encourage new writers of Jewish fiction," she says.

NEW ISRAELI FILM BIG BAD WOLVES IS 'BEST FILM OF THE YEAR,' TARANTINO SAYS

Israeli filmmakers Aharon Keshales and Navot Papushado's new film Big Bad Wolves is "mesmerizing from start to finish," according to the Hollywood Reporter, and the "best film of the year" according to American film director Quentin Tarantino.

Big Bad Wolves focuses on a series of brutal murders that put the lives of three men on a collision course: the father of the latest victim, a vigilante police detective and a religious studies teacher who is the main suspect. Big Bad Wolves probes whether a victim ever has the legitimate right to turn into a bloodthirsty vigilante.

The writer-directors said they took their inspiration from contemporary Israeli society and its atmosphere of terrorist violence and "unremitting feelings of being persecuted, inherent intolerance and macho behaviour topped with a historical craving for vengeance." Their first feature, Rabies, caused a sensation at the 2010 Tribeca Film Festival and was dubbed Israel's first horror film. Big Bad Wolves opens Jan. 17 in theatres across Canada.

Jewish opera star has debut with TSO

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

Jewish mezzo-soprano Lauren Segal teams with violinist Hilary Hahn and three other singers in the Toronto Symphony Orchestra production of Mozart's Coronation Mass Jan. 15 and 16 at Roy Thomson Hall.

The concerts, marking Segal's debut with the TSO, are part of the Mozart at 258 Festival from Jan. 11 to 23 presented by the orchestra in honour of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's 258th birthday.

"The Coronation Mass is a beautiful mix between the chorus, soloists and orchestra, and is memorable as one of Mozart's most powerful works, often used for royal coronations in Vienna during the 19th century," Segal said.

Born in South Africa but raised in Thornhill, Ont., after her family immigrated to Canada in 1986, Segal has already earned acclaim across Canada for her many roles in opera, performing from British Columbia to Nova Scotia with the Canadian Opera Company.

However, the opera star could have been known as the next Albert

Lauren Segal

Einstein instead of the next Beverly Sills. Segal switched careers while she was earning her master's degree in physics at University of Toronto.

"I loved music even as a child, but took it more seriously as a profession for me when I joined the choir as an undergraduate at York University. Most of my friends in the choir studied opera and I loved it myself. So, I took voice lessons, even while I was considering a career in physics, and have no regrets at all for having a career in music instead of science."

Segal's path to becoming an opera singer was quite different from that of many of her peers who planned for a singing career from the time they were children.

Competing with others who had a more traditional pedigree, Segal immersed herself in the study of French, German and Italian, as well as the history of opera, after leaving university.

Hard work combined with her talent paid off. Performing mostly with the Canadian Opera Company since 2006, Segal has earned standing ovations and critical acclaim for her performances as Sonya in War And Peace, Suzuki in Madama Butterfly, Valencienne in The Merry Widow and Nancy T'sing in Nixon In China, among other roles.

Segal's prominence as a young opera singer earned her the recognition to be accepted as the only Canadian in the prestigious Salzburg Festival For Young Artists in 2008, and she won the Metropolitan Opera National Council Auditions Encouragement Award twice.

She is only the second Jewish Canadian female opera singer ever to have reached national prominence. The first was the late Maureen Forrester.

Segal's grace, impeccable vocals and physical beauty have made her a sought-out artist. "You don't have to be huge to sing the notes anymore. What is necessary is to exercise the vocal chords, rehearsing and developing a stage presence."

Of all the roles she played on stage, Segal's favourite is the title role in Carmen, performed in Hamilton and Saskatoon.

"In the title role, Segal captivates the audience with her acting and her singing. Her beauty and alluring figure present a compelling Carmen as a sultry, smoldering femme fatale," Opera Canada wrote of Segal's performance in Saskatoon.

Although she has travelled to Israel, Segal has never performed there. She is proud of her Jewish roots, often being asked to sing in synagogues as a cantor.

"A lot of opera stars have become cantors, but I love performing on the stage and would miss it if I became a cantor. However, singing in the choir is fun to do when I can."

Segal sings with the choir at both Adath Israel Congregation and Beth Sholom Synagogue in Toronto, often on the High Holidays.

The Toronto Symphony Orchestra production of Mozart's Coronation Mass is Jan. 15 and 16, 8 p.m., at Roy Thomson Hall in Toronto. For tickets, call 416-593-4828 or go to www.tso.ca.

Multifaceted play focuses on Israeli-American family

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

When Ron Rutberg moved from Israel to Los Angeles to study film at UCLA in the 1970s, he became friends with a family who were also from Israel.

His first play, Seven Days, written three years ago, is loosely based on this family. Teatron Toronto Jewish Theatre presents the world premiere at the Toronto Centre for the Arts – Studio Theatre from Jan. 8 to 19.

Rutberg's tale follows the Reznick family. Nathan and Sarah Reznick were fighters in the Irgun, a right-wing Jewish underground movement in pre-independence Jerusalem. After their side won and the State of Israel was established, the Reznicks moved to America.

"It was a very organic play for me. It was so easy to write because I knew the family," Rutberg says. "I was a lonely, broke film student, and they were a couple with kids. I became friends with one of their sons.

"I come from a socialist, liberal background and they were very right-wing, so it was an unlikely alliance, but I really took to them. We had very serious political debates. They were so fiercely patriotic, veterans of pre-independence organizations in Israel. Eventually, I started wondering what they were doing in Los Angeles when they were so enthralled with everything going on back home. Finally, their son told me, [and this] is revealed in the play."

"This mystery drama lets us peek into two important events in the Reznick family," says Ari Weisberg, the Teatron founder and artistic director, "the day they kicked their youngest son, Barack, out of their home, and the reunion of the family at the death of Sarah 25 years later. And through their stories, we learn more, bit by bit, about their actions during the war."

Rutberg sees Seven Days as an immigrant story. He wants audiences to get the feeling of what it's like to leave your home country for somewhere else, with all the baggage you carry. He says it reflects an Israeli syndrome called "sitting on your luggage" – it's about feeling guilty about leaving your homeland.

"You cannot really tear yourself away from the whole Israeli narrative of coming to another country, and you really don't set roots," Rutberg says. "You struggle with your guilt at having left your homeland. This particular story is [about] that dynamic. On top of that, it is about how parents have their own Pandora's Box that they want to keep shut. They torture the kids in many ways by not letting them know the truth about the reasons why they left the country.

"This is also the story of a couple. Even though both of them were partners in a very heroic saga of bringing independence to the home country, yet they're in Los Angeles in a very toxic relationship."

Under the direction of Ari Weisberg, Teatron's Seven Days cast of eight includes Ron Boyd, Bob Cooper, Marion Hirschberg, Richard Hoffman, Geoff Kolomayz, Zachary B. Amzallag, Karina Bershteyn and Katherine Housley.

This is Rutberg's first experience working with a professional theatre company.

"Please forgive me for mentioning my name and Tennessee Williams in the same sentence," Rutberg says, and then explains. "Tennessee Williams said how much he benefited in his early days. He thought he wrote the penultimate play and the director challenged him on main points – they worked together, and Tennessee Williams says he came up with a much better play than he would have otherwise. Ari became my dramaturge. He challenged me on certain points and I feel that I benefited a lot from that."

Born and raised in Tel Aviv, Rutberg completed his army service and joined a small kibbutz on the Lebanese border in Upper Galilee before leaving for UCLA. After graduating, he began a career in motion picture production, eventually becoming a motion picture editor at various studios including CBS Television, Universal, Turner Entertainment and Warner Bros.

Rutberg has written a second play called Serious Business, currently being considered by several theatre companies. He's now working on a third play, Boo.

The playwright, who looks forward to coming to Toronto for the first time for the play's opening, is married to Joan, a sculptor and songwriter. They have twin sons, Daniel, an Internet marketing executive, and Elon, a film & TV writer-director now touring with singer Kanye West.

For tickets to Seven Days, contact Toronto Centre for the Arts box office or Ticketmaster 1-855-985-ARTS (2787). For information online, go to www.teatrontheatre.com

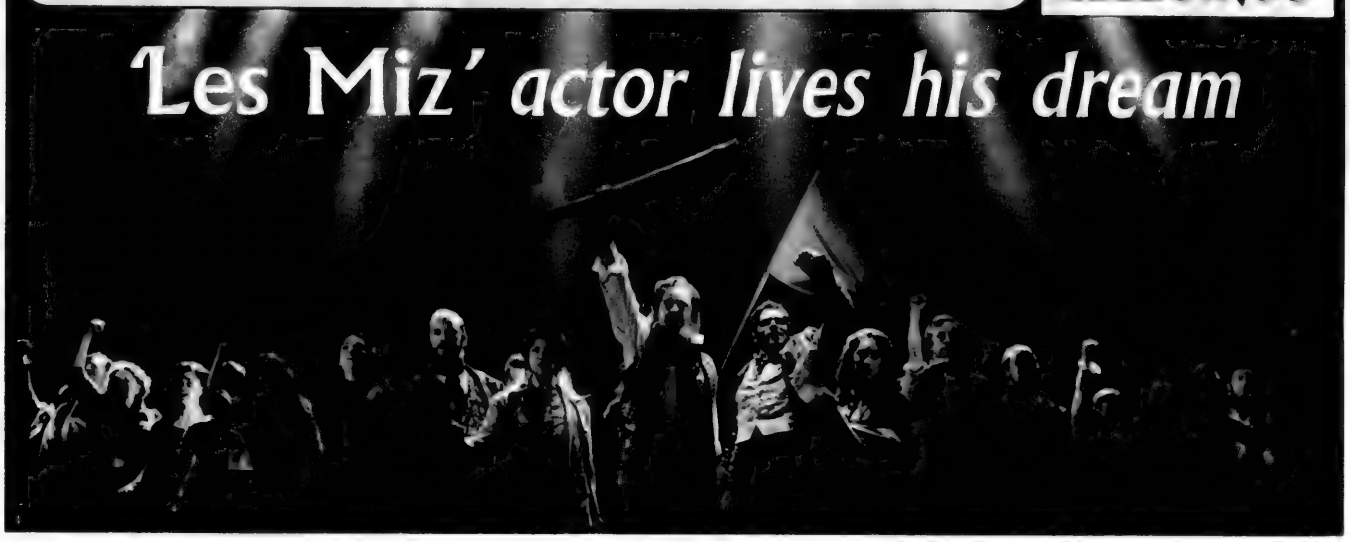
'Les Miz' actor lives his dream



Ilan Mester
Special to The CJN

It was pretty clear that Perry Sherman would grow up to be an actor. As a kid, he constantly found ways to get in front of an audience. Now the young performer gets to do that every single day, playing one of the leads in the hit Toronto production of Les Misérables.

"When I was a kid, it was magic," he tells The CJN. "I'd show up to family parties with a suitcase full of tricks. I loved entertaining people. Then as I got a little older, I started acting and later singing."

Sherman grew up in the epicentre of theatre: New York City. Believe it or not, he didn't catch many Broadway shows during his childhood. "I lived in Long Island and it was difficult to get us all into the city. It was reserved for special occasions," he says, "so it's retained a sense of wonder for me."

In fact, the New Yorker can thank his sister for introducing him to the musical he would later be cast in. "I do remember my mom and sister seeing Les Miserables when it was on Broadway," he says. "They came back so excited and my sis tried explaining the story to me... I was eight, but her excitement got me excited and that's how I first got a hold of the soundtrack."

By high school, Sherman knew he wanted to pursue theatre. He was accepted into the acting conservatory at the prestigious Carnegie Mellon University, where he met a voice teacher he clicked with and everything just fell into place. In his first year there, Sherman made his way to an open call audition (American Idol-style) for a Boston production of Spring Awakening.

"The show was a dream for any young person involved with music theatre," he says. "When I found out I had got the job, I was back at school and I flipped out in the cafeteria. It was great. My year of doing that show was life-changing and I made some amazing friends."

More recently, Sherman landed the main role in a New York production of the Tony Award-winning Avenue Q. That in itself was memorable enough, but the show was also special for another reason.

"The incredible Rick Lyon, who designed the puppets and starred in the original Broadway production of Avenue Q, decided to direct it," Sherman says. "He had auditions in New York City and I got cast as the lead. He reworked some of the set designs and most of us who had no puppet training got to work with him for over a month. The puppets were amazing; it's such a great show."

Although the play was an incredible experience, Sherman adds it was quite a challenge. "The show was a lot of work though, I had to train my arm to hold up a puppet for two hours."

Earlier last year, Sherman found himself out of work and decided to be proactive. The performer and a handful of friends made a funny video called Shit Jewish Bitches Say (a response to a trend going on at the time). However, he didn't expect the self-described "ridiculous" and "silly" video, which pays a cheeky homage to Jewish girls, to go viral the way it did. We're talking almost 55,000 views.

"That's what's great in this day and age, is that something so silly can get recognition. We didn't expect it to get a lot of attention, but here I am discussing it in an interview," he says, adding that "it was really a lot of fun to make."

Last spring, the young actor got cast in a regional mounting of Les Misérables in Utah. He played Marius, the same character he portrays on a much bigger scale in the Mirvish production of the show.

"I knew that [the Toronto] project was coming up when I started it and it was really just an amazing coincidence that this happened," he says. "It was a gift! I knew the material before starting the rehearsal process here and did some exploration and decision-making."

Sherman adds: "The director then comes in and tells you it's all wrong, but at least you've made a choice and you're not indifferent. The longer you play a character the more you discover, to a certain extent. Also, the opportunity to work with a different director on the same project is something you rarely get."

The actor says booking the Toronto production was anything but a simple task. Being an American meant he had to prove himself. "They really wanted to advertise the show as something Canadian made," he says. "I had to go in numerous times for the producers and director. Then I had a little work session with my love interest, Sam Hill, who had already been cast. They put me through the ringer, but it was amazing. I fought for the part and it was really satisfying when they offered it to me."

This isn't Sherman's first time in Toronto; he performed Next To Normal at the Four Seasons Centre a few years ago and brought Spring Awakening to the Ed Mirvish Theatre back in 2008. "I love this city," he admits. "It's weird to call it home and feel comfortable somewhere other then New York, but it has made an impression on me."

His advice for aspiring actors is simple: "Don't wait for opportunity, make your own. Create, sing, act wherever you can and find people who have a similar idea of what art is and start making it with them."

The ultimate gift

Married With Kids
Lauren Kramer

I'm writing this column from Israel, while back home my husband is determinedly battling bedtime alone with three older kids who refuse to acknowledge that they need rest. Usually, this is a frustrating war we fight together each night, but for 15 days, he has given me the ultimate gift: the gift of time.

When we first married, gifts were all about material things. We racked our brains and begged each other for clues when birthdays and anniversaries rolled around, trying to come up with unique gifts that said I love you with as much passion and conviction as material objects can muster. There was jewelry for extra-special occasions and an accumulation of other stuff that, after the initial excitement wore off, would eventually gather dust.

As the years passed, we both began to understand that purchasing material objects neither of us truly needed was a waste of time, energy and money. With the birth of our first child, we were introduced to a brand new concept of gift giving: the gift of time.

I can't forget the first time he gave me this special gift. I'd been up with the baby during the night and foggily navigating my way through the daylight hours with a newborn. My home, my neighbourhood and my world felt like an entirely new place now that I was officially a mother, a place rife with challenges. But with that role came fatigue like I'd never known it before. I was depleted, exhausted and permanently anxious about the nights ahead, which, intercepted by regular breastfeeds, promised to be no more restful than the ones that had preceded it.

One afternoon early into our parenthood experience, my husband returned from work, took our bundle of baby from my arms and said the words I longed desperately to hear: "You go take a nap. I'm going to take the baby for a walk."

In that moment, I fell in love with him all over again. My nap couldn't have been more than an hour, but it was a siesta more precious than roses, chocolates, lingerie or any of the other typical gifts women are supposed to covet from their spouses. It was a gift that said, "You go first," at a time when we were both so very tired. But one of us had to be the parent in charge, and he volunteered, handing me a period of perfect, uninterrupted sleep that remains, to this day, unforgettable.

Fast forward 17 years, and we've both become better equipped to handle sleepless nights. Still, the gift of time has persisted as the most meaningful gift we can exchange. Oftentimes the gift is a brief one: a couple of hours out with a good friend, a game of poker with the guys, or an evening bike ride on a hot summer night.

Occasionally, though, we get extra generous with each other. Which is how I come to write this column from Israel. It's a mammoth gift, this one, a gift that implies many sacrifices in his daily schedule and a great deal more stress than he might ordinarily encounter. I can only hope I have the generosity of spirit to match it someday, to turn to him and say with total magnaminity, "It's your turn to take a break."

Because time, and how we spend it, is the greatest gift of all.

JACOB'S OATH

CJN* freelance correspondent Masada Siegel, right, talks to award-winning NBC News special correspondent Martin Fletcher about his new book, Jacob's Oath. The book is set in Germany at the conclusion of World War II.

Fletcher explained, "Not much has been written about the aftermath of World War II. Novels are usually about the more dramatic periods of the build-up to war, the war itself, and then the new world after the war. What fascinates me about the first few months after the end of the war in May 1945 is the period of anarchy, the transition, the bewilderment of 20 million refugees clogging the roads of Europe trying to go home, yet ultimately, there is no home. Refugees can't go home because there is no home. Everything has changed. What was that like? That's what interests me, partly maybe because my reporting career was so much about that, in wars and disaster zones across the globe for 35 years."

Girl Guide cookies now certified kosher

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

For the first time, Girl Guides of Canada's cookies will be certified kosher, thanks to a shomer Shabbat unit that pushed the organization to become more inclusive.

"The first question the girls asked when we started the unit was, 'When can we sell cookies?'" said Sara Silverman, who started the unit with her friend, Michelle Nauenberg, three years ago, when they decided they wanted their daughters to experience the Guides program without having to miss out on activities scheduled on Saturdays.

"It is all about fostering positive female experiences to boost self confidence in a totally safe and supportive environment," Silverman said.

It was easy enough to adapt the activities to fit a Jewish lifestyle, Silverman said. The group of 31 girls meets on Sundays at the Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto synagogue in Thornhill, taking part in regular Girl Guide activities, but following Jewish law, such as only allowing kosher food into the synagogue and avoiding Saturday activities.

But the cookies, which are one of the Guides' main fundraising tools, weren't certified kosher, although there was nothing unkosher about the ingredients in the chocolate and vanilla cookies, Silverman said.

"This made the girls very sad, as they really wanted to be able to sell the cookies," she said, adding that missing out on this fundraiser was difficult financially on the unit. "We tried other fundraisers, but the girls kept asking."

Around two years ago, the group decided they would try to have the cookies certified. At first, Silverman said she was told it was not financially feasible, but with lots of perseverance, Girl Guides of Canada eventually agreed. Recently, it confirmed that the chocolate and vanilla cookies for the spring fundraiser – but not the mint chocolate ones, and not the cookies from the autumn fundraiser – would be certified under the Orthodox Union's OU hechsher.

"It feels like our unit has made a difference," said Avigail Rucker, a 12-year-old participant.

Try something different

Sue Epstein
Special to The CJN

Do something different. Enjoy a dinner of just appetizers once in a while. Try these Sesame Chicken Strips, some Potato Skins, Baked Salami or perhaps some store-bought pigs-in-the-blanket. Add some cut up fresh vegetables and top the meal off with Pound Cake Cobbler. What a fun, family meal to eat in front of the TV or when you have friends over to watch a game… try it some night!

SESAME CHICKEN STRIPS

(Can be made in less than 1/2 hour)

1/2 cup mayonnaise
1 tsp. onion powder or dried minced onion
1 tsp. dry mustard
1/2 cup crushed crackers
1/4 cup sesame seeds
1 1/4 lb. boneless chicken breasts
Sauce:
1/2 cup mayonnaise
2 tbsp. honey
1 tbsp. prepared mustard

In a bowl combine 1/2 cup mayonnaise, onion and 1 tsp. mustard. In another bowl, combine cracker crumbs and sesame seeds.

Cut chicken lengthwise into 1/4-inch strips. Dip strips into mayonnaise mixture, then into cracker mixture. Place in a single layer on a large baking sheet lined with foil or a disposable pan. Grease. Bake at 425 for 15 minutes or until juices run clear.

Combine sauce ingredients and serve with chicken strips. Makes 5-6 appetizer servings.

BAKED SALAMI

1 medium salami
1/2 c. brown sugar
1 tbsp. mustard
1 bottle chili sauce
dash lemon juice

Cut slashes lengthwise all around salami. Combine remaining ingredients. Spread over salami and bake at 250 degrees for 3 hours, basting every 20 minutes. Serve with black bread and spicy mustard.

POTATO SKINS

5 medium baking potatoes
2 tbsp. margarine, melted
1/2 cup chopped tomato, optional for garnish
1/4 cup sliced green onions, optional for garnish
salsa, optional for garnish

Scrub potatoes, prick with a fork and microwave on high for 11 to 14 minutes, or until just tender. Cut potatoes in half lengthwise and scoop out pulp, leaving a 1/4-inch-thick shell.

Brush inside of each potato with melted margarine and sprinkle with a favourite seasoning (basil, paprika, garlic, etc.). Bake in 375-degree oven for 18-20 minutes.

Serve with salsa for dipping, or chopped tomato and sliced green onions. Note: If you're making Sesame Chicken Strips, just bake potato skins together with the chicken but for a shorter period of time because of the higher oven temperature. Makes 6-8 servings.

POUND CAKE COBBLER

1 store bought pound cake (about 10-3/4 oz.)
1 can cherry pie filling
1/3 cup water
1/2 tsp. almond extract
2 tbsp. slivered almonds (toasted preferable)
pareve whipped cream

Cut pound cake into 1-in. cubes. Place in a 1-1/2 quart microwave-safe casserole dish. In a small bowl, combine pie filling, water and almond extract. Spoon pie filling over cake cubes and sprinkle with almonds. Cover with plastic wrap and microwave on high 5-7 minutes, or until hot. Serve warm, topped with whipped cream. Makes 4-6 servings.

Ariel Sharon 1928–2014

'Friend, leader, military chief'

JTA

JERUSALEM — Former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon was remembered at his funeral as a man of courage and strength, both on the battlefield and in the political arena.

"Sharon was a complex man who lived in complex times in a complex neighbourhood," U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden said during the memorial ceremony Monday at the Knesset plaza in Jerusalem.

Sharon, Biden said, "engendered strong opinions. But like all historic leaders, he had a north star that guided him. The north star, which he never – in my observation – deviated from... was the survival of the State of Israel and the Jewish People."

Former British prime minister Tony Blair, who currently serves as the ambassador of the Mideast Peace Quartet (the United States, United Nations, European Union and Russia), recalled that Sharon was not comfortable in formal meetings, tending to repeat himself or read from prepared texts.

Blair said that when Sharon accepted an invitation to his home for dinner, he saw "a different Arik – warm-hearted, humorous and charming, and passionate."

Blair said that despite agreeing to the failed 2003 Road Map for peace that proposed a two-state solution for Israel and the Palestinians, as well as evacuating Gaza settlements and forming the centrist Kadima party, Sharon's "strategic goal never wavered: [Israel] had to be protected for future generations. When that meant fighting, he fought. When that meant making peace, he sought peace with the same iron determination."

Israeli President Shimon Peres called Sharon "a friend, a leader, a military chief."

Israeli Firm Bought

MONTREAL — Montreal-based bicycle and baby-product maker Dorel Industries is buying fellow baby-product maker Tiny Love Ltd. of Tel Aviv for an undisclosed price. Tiny Love, known for its innovative developmental toys, has offices in China and the United States, and sales of about $45 million last year, Dorel said. It also has a strong presence in eastern Europe, "which is an important part of our growth strategy," Dorel president and CEO Martin Schwartz said last week.

Tourism Record Set

JERUSALEM — Israel reported an all-time high in annual visitors in 2013. A record 3.54 million visitors arrived in Israel in 2013, half a percent more than the previous record year. Meanwhile, some 272,000 tourists arrived in December, a 14 per cent increase over December 2012, setting a record for most arrivals in the Jewish state in one month. The figures were released Jan. 9 by Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics. Nearly 18 per cent of tourists arrived from the United States, with some 623,000 Americans visiting. Russia sent 603,000 tourists, and France 315,000. More than half the tourists, or 53 per cent, were Christian. Only 28 per cent were Jewish. Tourism contributed about $11.4 billion to Israel's economy in 2013, the Ministry of Tourism said.

Poet Dies

NEW YORK — Amiri Baraka, the New Jersey poet laureate whose works were celebrated by blacks but often condemned by Jews, has died. Baraka's writings, lectures and poetry brought him national renown starting in the 1960s, and the one-time black nationalist was celebrated by many African Americans as a voice of the disenfranchised. He was a winner of the PEN/Faulkner Award. But Baraka, who died Jan. 9 at age 79, also could be hateful. In September 2002, not long after he was named New Jersey's poet laureate, he wrote a poem called Somebody Blew Up America that suggested Israel knew in advance about the 9/11 attacks. He wrote, "Who knew the World Trade Center was gonna get bombed/Who told 4,000 Israeli workers at the Twin Towers/To stay home that day/Why did Sharon stay away?" The poem prompted calls for his dismissal as poet laureate, including by then-governor James McGreevey. Baraka refused. After it became clear there was no way to force him out, New Jersey's legislature voted in 2003 to eliminate the position entirely.

Missing Teen Found Safe in New York

Caleb Jacoby

BOSTON — Police in Brookline, Mass., said 16-year-old Caleb Jacoby has been found safe in New York City.

Jacoby, an 11th-grader at the Maimonides School in suburban Boston, had been missing since midday on Jan. 6.

The case drew national attention, in part because the youth is the son of Boston Globe columnist Jeff Jacoby.

Some 200 volunteers, including friends and neighbours of the family as well as members of local Jewish groups, searched throughout the Boston area in a co-ordinated effort on Jan. 8. The effort was spearheaded by the Maimonides School.

"Our prayers have been answered," Jacoby said via Twitter. "We are thrilled to hear from the Brookline Police that our beloved son Caleb has been found and is safe. Words can't express our gratitude for the extraordinary outpouring of kindness and support that we have received from so many people. All we can think of at this moment is how wonderful it will be to see Caleb again and shower him with love."

JF & CS seeks adoptive families for older kids

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Sheryl Ederman, manager of foster care and adoption at Jewish Family & Child, wants every kid to have a permanent seat at the dinner table.

The agency's goal is for all children, even older ones, to be connected to a family, she said.

Currently, the agency is trying to make plans for about 20 kids, ages five through 18, Ederman said, and she hopes members of the Jewish community will step forward to help.

"That does not necessarily mean [an older kid] living with the family, but it does mean having a strong family connection."

Sheryl Ederman

Ederman said that after one youth in care got a job recently, she told her worker that although she had a good first day, she was distressed after talking to human resources.

"They asked her for an emergency contact and she had no one to name. She had a wonderful relationship with her worker, but she should have family. We need to develop family for these kids."

Adoption has changed, she said. Until two years ago, Crown wards who had any contact with their biological family could not be adopted, but "Crown wards are now eligible for adoption. Once the agency gets wardship of a child, we can begin to make permanent plans."

When it comes to older kids, community members who want to help have a number of options.

"There are a few levels of choices, such as adoption, a lifelong connection, or a legal guardian."

She said there are about 50 potential adoptive parents on the agency's waiting list, but most want young kids.

"People have to be open to building families differently. These families have been contacted about adopting older kids, and some have been receptive.

"Now we have to follow up, and try to figure out who could fit with what family. We have to find a common thread and try to start with the right match."

One 13-year-old boy, Tyler, for example, is a sports fanatic, and plays basketball with this foster siblings. "Tyler would fit in well with an active family of his own.

"Allison, 16, loves to bake and she works at a cupcake shop on the weekends. She has lived at the same foster home since she was nine, but [recently] was told her foster family is moving without her. She needs a permanent place."

Fostering children is a short-term solution, Ederman said.

"We want kids to be in foster care as long as it takes to find a permanent connection, even if it is the foster parents."

The first connection they seek is family members or close friends of the child, she said.

"When a family is struggling and says they have no one to care for their child, they could be ashamed or estranged from other family members. We have had aunts and uncles come forward and say, 'If I only knew that my niece was in foster care... why didn't anyone call me?' We actively search for these people to see if they can step up," Ederman said.

"Kids need to be in their own community, whether they are unaffiliated or Orthodox. If a non-Jewish family member or friend meets the needs of the Jewish child, we will consider that as well.

"Our goal is for the child to be with someone who loves them."

Why calling Israel a Jewish state is crucial

Why is it now controversial that Israel should be asking the Palestinians to recognize Israel as a Jewish state?

For some, like Roger Cohen of the New York Times, you'd think this constituted an outrageous, right-wing demand intended to stymie progress toward a two-state Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement.

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

In his Dec. 31 Times column, Cohen wrote: "This issue is a waste of time, a complicating diversion when none is needed… If Israel looks like a Jewish state and acts like a Jewish state, that is good enough for me – as long as it gets out of the corrosive business of occupation."

It might well be good enough for Cohen, but the question is whether it's good enough for the Palestinians. Even Cohen admits that "any two-state peace agreement will have to be final and irreversible; it must ensure there are no further Palestinian claims on a secure Israel. It may well require some form of words saying the two states are the homelands of their respective peoples… But that is for another day."

The recognition that there should, in a genuine two-state agreement, be "no further Palestinian claims" brings us to the heart of the matter, which Cohen dodges: unless Israel is recognized as the homeland of the Jewish people (with full democratic rights for its Arab minority citizens), Palestinians will continue insisting, as they have, on the "right of return" to Israel of Palestinian refugees and their descendants, now estimated by the UN at 5.5. million people.

The unique status of Palestinian refugees shows just how difficult, even intractable, their case has become. "Returning" to a future Palestinian state would be one possible solution. PA president Mahmoud Abbas, however, has insisted that he will not renounce a Palestinian "right of return" to Israel (even if there have been discussions in the past about limiting the number of refugees "returning" to Israel out of deference to Israeli demographic concerns). If the principle remains sacrosanct, future demands for Israel to absorb larger numbers would be inevitable.

In fact, there would be no end of claims. Unless, that is, the Palestinians were at last willing to acknowledge the Jewish character of Israel.

What's been lost in this debate is that the Palestinians themselves set a precedent back in 1988 for doing just this.

On Nov. 15, 1988, the Palestinian National Council (PNC), the PLO's "parliament in exile," met in Algiers and, among other things, decided – 41 years after the fact – finally to recognize UN General Assembly resolution 181 of Nov. 29, 1947 – the famous partition resolution for Palestine. (The Jewish leadership of the 1940s accepted the plan, but the Palestinian leadership and the Arab states violently rejected it).

At the Algiers summit, the Palestinians declared that "General Assembly Resolution 181 of 1947, which partitioned Palestine into two states, Arab and Jewish… still provides the legal basis for the right of the Palestinian Arab people to national sovereignty and independence."

It appears that this is the only occasion in which the Palestinians have used the term "Jewish" state, but, in finally accepting UNGA 181 as the basis for their state, the Palestinians acknowledged (if only by implication) the basis for the right of the Jewish people to a state of their own (even though the PNC called the partition plan a historic injustice and disparaged Israel).

Nonetheless, that's the meaning of the partition resolution: two states for two peoples – precisely what Israel claims must be accepted now if a genuine two-state solution is to be achieved. Once again, this means that the Palestinians will have to confine their claim (not recognized in international law) for a "right of return" to a Palestinian state. Otherwise Israel would become, demographically, another Arab state.

This is what's at stake, and this is why even Isaac Herzog, the newly elected leader of the Israeli Labor opposition party, recently said that he, too, supports in principle the recognition of Israel as the Jewish state.

Protesters argue during a demonstration outside Tel Aviv University Jan. 9. Tens of thousands of African asylum seekers have been rallying recently against a law allowing authorities to keep them in open-ended detention until their asylum requests are granted, they're deported or they volunteer to leave Israel. [Tomer Neuberg/Flash90 photo]

Sharon's final lesson

For all his many accomplishments, and his comparatively few failures, the one thing Ariel Sharon will ultimately be remembered for is the Gaza disengagement plan, put into effect over the course of the summer of 2005. No event in his storied military and political career better illustrates the fighting spirit that drove Israel's 11th prime minister to constantly push forward, or conveys his eventual realization that the best cause one can ever hope to fight for is peace.

It took him most of his life to figure that out – in fact, for decades, peace did not appear to figure into Sharon's decision-making. Peace surely wasn't on his mind when he joined the Haganah after high school, or at the battle of Latrun in the 1948 War of Independence. Unit 101, the elite military squad he formed in 1953, was explicitly engineered for the opposite of making peace – seeking retribution.

In Sinai in 1956, when he disobeyed orders and pushed toward the Mitla Pass, and when he turned a blind eye at Sabra and Shatila in 1982, peace wasn't part of his calculation. He thumbed his nose at peace as a champion of the settler cause. Palestinians broke into a round of riots and terror after he visited the Dome of the Rock in 2000. Wherever Sharon went, it seemed, violence always followed.

There is no question Sharon undertook all of the above with Israel's best interests at heart, but in the end, he realized that pursuing peace was the only way to ensure Israel's future – that violence only begat more violence. And yet even as he underwent this fascinating metamorphosis, his essence remained unchanged: he continued to fight with the same unique combination of smarts and guts, and his patriotic drive remained strong. The only thing that changed was the way he channelled that energy.

Alas, Sharon was not allotted as much time to chase peace as he spent hunting security – he fell ill just months after the disengagement came to a close. It must have taken a toll on him, to watch Gush Katif erupt in near-civil war, residents and soldiers battling each other, a nation at risk of being torn apart – and finally, Palestinians blindly tearing down what Jews had worked so hard to build, then increasing the rocket attacks.

The stroke that left him comatose for eight years followed too soon after the disengagement drama for it to have been a coincidence. If it was all too much for Sharon, who could blame him?

Ariel Sharon didn't survive disengagement, but Israel did, and in the course of that summer, the Jewish state's path forward became clear. It was no longer enough to express a desire to make peace, at the right moment and with the right partner. The time had come to force peace to happen, even if that meant going it alone and offering painful sacrifices with no guarantee of reciprocation.

Sharon taught this final lesson to his people, then he was gone. For a man who lived his life with boldness, he saved the best for last.

Netanyahu and Mandela's funeral

In its quest to be a "little bit edgier," I hope The CJN does not alienate one segment of the Jewish community in order to placate or appeal to another. I thought the raison d'être of this paper, which prides itself on being a mouthpiece of this community, recognizes that said community is broad and diverse, and as such, it should represent all voices, including conflicting ones, and wherever possible, to find some common ground.

A case in point is the editorial ("Netanyahu's Lame Excuse," The CJN, Dec. 19), which lambasted Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu for not attending Nelson Mandela's funeral. I personally would have preferred if he had been there, though I recognize that there are those who agree with his absence. One can take a principled editorial stance, whether popular or unpopular, with a calm voice that does not denigrate the intelligence of those with whom one disagrees. To cite a Yiddish phrase that, sadly, has gone out of style, "Ess passt nisht" – "It's not becoming."

Eli Honig

The CJN's editorial writer should have done a little due diligence before he made the assumption: "That's why Netanyahu stayed away." It is common knowledge that South Africa's security service is not exactly a model of competence and integrity, and that the shredded rump of the Jewish branch of the Communist party planned a major embarrassment to "welcome" the Israeli prime minister.

Nor should it be assumed that Israel would have been given full rein to implement its own security requirements, regardless of cost, as U.S. President Barack Obama was allowed to do, and with whom Netanyahu wished to avoid any contact that would have turned into a "misunderstanding."

But most of all, South Africa's increasingly embittered and aggressive Muslim communities planned a series of pro-Palestinian demonstrations that could easily have gotten out of hand, as things so often do on that unfortunate continent.

Canada's Jewish community now has plenty to contend with arising from Canada's inevitable confrontation with Quebec and a large dysfunctional Muslim community of our own. Who are we to second guess from a great distance the decisions that other leaders cannot avoid?

Settlers are not terrorists

Arie Raif ("Israel must act to avoid civil war, The CJN, Dec. 19) has put forward illogical, pathetically appeasing and scare-mongering ideas in his article. He wrongly equates "price tag" gangs with settlers. They are not the same, and they don't want to start a war with other Israelis. What they have in common is that they both retaliate or defend themselves against the violence of the Palestinians. That violence is, however, not mentioned in the article, leaving the reader to wrongly assume that the Jews are originating the violence, while the Arabs are sitting in their fields smelling the flowers. If there is a civil war, it will be between the Arabs and the Jews, not between Jew and Jew as in Raif's examples.

Raif says that "Israel must take pre-emptive action against Jewish terrorists whose doctrine of arrogance, messianism, militarism and nationalism will lead to a civil war." If Raif were truly a Zionist, he would have said, "Israel must take pre-emptive action against Arab terrorists whose doctrines of arrogance, violence, militarism, Islamism, and the destruction of the Jewish state will lead to an internal terrorist attack against Israel."

Israel must lead on human rights

I have to say that this was a very one-sided article. ("Israel's critics often ignore its unique predicament," The CJN, Dec. 26).

One of the major themes is why Israel is picked on with boycotts for human rights violations when there are other nations that are worse than Israel. Paul Michaels says Israel is better on this count than Syria. Wow! That's a pretty low benchmark.

Israel is also better on this count than North Korea, South Sudan, Zimbabwe and many other nations. Israel always makes the point that it is the only democracy in the Middle East. Israel should be held to a high standard in all of its endeavours, particularly human rights, not the lowest common denominator.

Snowden vs. Pollard: A contrast in treatment

Bernie Farber

Former NSA and CIA consultant Edward Snowden languishes under temporary Russian asylum while much of the United States argues about whether he's a traitor or a hero.

Snowden, in his capacity as a consultant with America's most important and secretive intelligence agencies, gathered information that demonstrated longstanding covert global surveillance. He leaked it to a number of western news agencies, including the Washington Post and the Guardian in what was described as the most significant unauthorized release of classified material in the history of the United States.

Snowden's motivation? He believed in his heart of hearts that the American public had a right to know what their government was doing in their name.

The debate rages on. Some senators, such as right-wing Republican and Tea Party favourite Rand Paul, have publicly stated that Snowden deserves leniency.

Indeed, Paul picked up the current thinking of at least one federal court judge, who believes that the NSA's actions as exposed by Snowden are unconstitutional. Not to be outdone, another federal judge offered a very contrary opinion, arguing that the NSA is fully within its rights, leaving the entire question open to a Supreme Court challenge.

Couple this with the fact that other senators, such as Democrat Charles Schumer, strongly believe that Snowden deserves the harshest of punishments.

And yet again, on the other side of the ledger, the liberal-leaning New York Times has argued editorially that Snowden should be granted clemency.

Edward Snowden

Contrast this with the older, but equally notorious, spying debacle of Jonathan Pollard, who in 1987, while working as an intelligence analyst for the United States, passed classified information to an ally, Israel.

Pollard's life sentence was the severest ever given to an American citizen for spying on behalf of an ally. No amount of contrition or heartfelt acknowledgments of wrongdoing by Pollard seems to have moved the American intelligence community. Indeed, in 1998, then-Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu pleaded with then-U.S. president Bill Clinton for Pollard's release. Clinton indicated in his memoirs that he was favourably disposed to doing so, but he cited the robust objections of the intelligence community for not moving forward.

It took until 2010 for the American political system to reassess the Pollard case, fully 23 years after he was sentenced. Representatives Barney Frank, Anthony Weiner, Bill Pascrell and Edolfus Townes asked President Barack Obama to consider clemency. This was followed by 39 members of Congress backing a plea for leniency along with numerous others, including former secretaries of state Henry Kissinger and George Schultz, former CIA director James Woolsey, and the chair of the Senate intelligence committee, Arlen Specter.

Jonathan Pollard

To be sure, there have also been many nay-sayers who oppose Pollard's release. Former secretary of defence Donald Rumsfeld, former vice-president Dick Cheney and other former defence secretaries, including Caspar Weinberger, James Schlesinger and Elliott Richardson, all oppose any form of leniency. In 2011, the New York Times reported that Obama was considering Pollard's case, though vice-president Joe Biden was dead set against anything less than Pollard serving his full term.

To date, Pollard continues to serve his unprecedented life sentence in federal prison.

In the early stages of this case, most Jewish organizations, fearing the specter of the "dual loyalty" charge, stayed far away from Pollard. It has only been recently and in retrospect that certain respected Jewish legalists and leaders have begun to petition for his release.

Some have suggested that had Pollard been a non-Jew or if Israel were not part of the equation, he never would have received such a severe sentence. In his book Chutzpah, Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz, a confidant to many U.S. presidents and renowned legal counsel said, "As an American, and as a Jew, I hereby express my outrage at Jonathan Pollard's sentence of life imprisonment for the crime to which he pleaded guilty."

From where I sit, the actions of both Pollard and Snowden deserve to be seen for what they are: acts of treason that violated the public trust. No matter the motivation, the fidelity to law must always be paramount. Yet, given the treatment of Snowden even before he has entered a courtroom or sat one minute in jail, surely it's time to reconsider the Pollard case.

I fear history will be unkind in its appraisal of a government that incarcerated a felon who certainly broke the law of the land but seemed more harshly judged than another American citizen whom most agree committed the most significant leak of classified material ever in the United States.

Bernie Farber, a former CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, writes on human and civil rights matters. He's currently senior vice-president of Gemini Power Corp.

Hoping to influence then-U.S. Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney during his 2012 campaign visit to Israel, protesters held large posters of prominent U.S. officials who have requested the release of convicted spy Jonathan Pollard outside the Jerusalem hotel where Romney was staying. Pollard, an American civilian intelligence analyst, was sentenced to life in prison by the United States in 1987 for spying for Israel.

An arms cache, and the Palestinian state of terror

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Jamel al-Jamal was the Palestinian "ambassador" to the Czech Republic, until he was killed by an explosion in his official residence in Prague on Jan. 2. The stories concocted to explain his death followed quickly: Palestinian officials blamed a safe that had been locked for 20 years in the old PLO offices, and then moved to a new location and opened. Riad Malki, known as the Palestinian foreign minister, was quoted as saying that the ambassador "decided to open it. After he opened it, apparently something happened inside [the safe] and went off".

An old exploding safe would be, in itself, a strange item, given the history of Palestinian terror, including (or particularly) in Europe. In addition, the hastily invented cover-up quickly unravelled, and the PLO's embassy spokesperson told Czech radio that the safe was "used on a daily basis at the embassy and it was opened and closed almost every day." As the comedic bungling continued, Palestinian officials invented new fictions, telling journalists the weapons were recently retrieved from an old sack, untouched for decades, and that the mission's staff had informed the Czech authorities. But according to Prague Police Chief Martin Vondrasek, the deadly terror arsenal has "not gone through a registration process in the Czech Republic."

Czech officials, to their credit, began a real investigation, and found that al-Jamal (a member of Yasser Arafat's Fatah wing of the PLO since 1975) had enough weapons stored in his residence to arm a terror group of at least 10 people. One report referred to 70 weapons, including submachine guns. And if these weapons were stored in one PLO location, it's likely that similar caches are stored throughout Europe. (One has to wonder whether other governments would have had the backbone of the Czechs – the past 50 years provide many examples of the European practice of avoiding uncomfortable confrontation with Palestinian and other terrorists.)

This deadly explosion (a "work accident") serves as a critical reminder showing that although almost 10 years have passed since the death of Arafat, who shaped the PLO as a terror organization, not much has changed. The Prague arsenal is today's equivalent of the Karine-A – the ship carrying 50 tons of weapons, including short-range Katyusha rockets, anti-tank missiles, and high explosives – that Arafat had organized in 2002. Had he succeeded and had the Karine-A not been detected, boarded and seized by the Israeli navy, thousands of Israelis would have been killed.

Arafat's successor, Mahmoud Abbas, looks, dresses and talks differently, and the façade of diplomacy has been nurtured, but the role of terror remains under the surface. The PLO of 2014 also benefits from additional pseudo-diplomatic immunity provided by the UN General Assembly's vote to recognize a Palestinian state, offering the opportunity to expand the network of PLO operatives and terrorists in European and other cities. Whether the PLO uses the weapons and explosives smuggled overseas in its own attacks, or provides them to other groups, the results are the same.

Most Israelis don't need exploding safes, mysterious deaths, and weapons arsenals to remind them of the unchanging violence at the core of the PLO's agenda – they see the ongoing terror attacks and incitement continuously. Recently, Palestinians based in Bethlehem used pressure-cooker bombs like the ones used by the Boston Marathon terrorists to blow up a bus in the city of Bat Yam. Thankfully, the bombs were discovered in time, and no one was hurt. As a result, Israelis are understandably less than enthusiastic about a Palestinian terror-state a short distance from Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, ready to launch rockets and infiltrate murderers. No foreign police force in the strategic Jordan Valley or elsewhere is going to protect Israeli lives.

For the U.S. government officials such as Secretary of State John Kerry, European enthusiasts, and others working intensively to create just such a Palestinian state, the Prague explosion and arsenal is a reminder of the differences between well-intentioned theories and practical realities.

Negotiations, treaty drafts, peace conferences, maps and borders, and the rest remain irrelevant as long as terror continues.

Peace, in any meaningful sense, requires an end to violence. And our Palestinian partners, whether in Europe or next door, are not there yet.

Israel must deal humanely with African refugees

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

To paraphrase Emma Lazarus, the tired, poor and huddled masses of several beleaguered East African nations, some autocratic and repressive, have made their way to Israel in droves over the last few years.

Estimated at between 50,000 to 60,000, they entered Israel through our previously porous frontier with Egypt's Sinai Peninsula. Most come from Eritrea and Sudan – including many from Darfur and South Sudan, which just recently became independent.

Tel Aviv, Eilat and Arad have the largest concentrations of them. Depending on one's inclination, these Africans are refugees, asylum seekers, illegal employment seekers or infiltrators.

Our government hasn't done a good enough job dealing with them, although just over a month ago, after 3-1/2 years and 1.6 billion shekels (roughly $500 million Cdn), work was completed on a 245-kilometre long fence along our border with Egypt. Erected primarily due to security considerations relating to chaos and Islamic terrorism afflicting the Sinai Peninsula, this fence has also stemmed the influx of Africans into Israel.

Some Israelis criticize stopping the flow of these Africans into the country. In view of modern Jewish history, they believe Israel can't turn away people in danger of grave injury and even death if they return to their own countries. However, most Israelis believe the number of Africans in the country has reached a critical mass and that we should be dealing with those already here.

The crux of the matter is what should Israel do with the tens of thousands of Africans in our midst. Regrettably, to date, our government has failed, both morally and effectively, in this regard.

Initially, the government provided no direction or policy whatsoever. Could Africans work or not? Were they to be arrested, deported or protected? Could they receive medical care? Open bank accounts? Could their kids go to school? Would someone examine and process their requests for refugee status?

With no clear answers to these and other questions, inertia kicked in. So did NGOs, filling the void and helping these Africans as much as they can.

These folks want to work, to subsist. What little they save is sent home to those left behind. And for fear of political persecution or worse, most can't return to Eritrea, Sudan or South Sudan, and no other country will have them.

Last year, things came to a head in Tel Aviv, which has the largest concentration of Africans, mostly living alongside Israelis in lower-income neighbourhoods in the southern parts of the city. Not all have found work. Some live in public parks. Crime has risen, and living conditions for Israelis in these areas have become difficult, some say unbearable. A young Israeli woman was gang-raped last year. People are afraid to leave their homes.

Populist politicians entered the picture, fuelling anger and discontent with egregious xenophobic exclamations. One MK called Africans "a cancer in our body."

Our government's response was to build detention centres and pass laws allowing authorities to incarcerate infiltrators for up to three years. Thankfully, the Supreme Court quashed this legislation as not in keeping with Israel's constitutional foundations.

But the government can see no other solution. Almost immediately after the court's decision, it initiated new legislation, this time allowing confinement of infiltrators for up to a year. This, too, is being challenged legally, but in the meantime hundreds, some say thousands of Africans are being rounded up and sent to a new "open" detention centre built in the Negev desert near the Egyptian border – "open" because detainees are allowed out during days and must return at night. But the truth is that being stuck where they are, these detainees have nowhere to go most days.

Instead of spending millions building and maintaining prisons, the government would be more sensible and on higher moral ground if it allocated those funds to provide vocational training and jobs for these Africans, who are not enemies of the state, but rather unfortunate individuals who made lengthy journeys to the only real democracy in the region. This would be money much better spent.

In the meantime, tens of thousands of Africans are demonstrating in Tel Aviv and Eilat, beginning hunger strikes and demanding better treatment.

It's not certain where this will lead. One thing is certain, though: most of these Africans won't be leaving Israel anytime soon, and it's high time our government understood this and started treating them and their Israeli neighbours properly.

MukiBaum Foundation gets new HQ

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

If you like to shop at Lawrence Plaza or enjoy a nosh at United Bakers, there's a good chance that on any given weekend, you'll find Muki Baum in the vicinity, seated on his motorized scooter.

His other favourite haunt is the Holt Renfrew store on Bloor Street, where shelter can be found from the winter cold.

Whether it's along the Bathurst Street corridor or on Bloor, Muki has found success in raising funds for the organization that bears his name, the MukiBaum Accessibility Foundation.

On a good day, he can come home with $300 from Lawrence and Bathurst. Last year, he raised $35,000 in all, his mom, Nehama, said.

Those efforts, along with those of professional fundraisers, have paid off, as the foundation will celebrate its official launch on Jan. 23 at its new headquarters at 401 Magnetic Dr.

The 11,000-square-foot facility will house the foundation's "Academy for Life," explained Nehama, the driving force behind the organization.

It's aimed at clients who experience a broad range of developmental disabilities, including autism and physical restrictions. Geared to enhancing "access" and the development of "ability," the foundation offers clients therapy through music, dance, visual arts, yoga, sand play and sensory therapy.

The foundation, which was founded in 2011 and is unconnected to the similarly named Muki Baum Treatment Centres, aims at improving the quality of life both of clients and their family members. The therapies will help clients adapt to their surroundings, make them more confident, aid in their learning and increase their independence.

"We are all about [helping] people feel they have value and meaning to their lives," said Nehama, a social worker by profession with an expertise in special education and counselling.

The new facility will serve as the foundation's "hub," Nehama continued. It will include a morning program for toddlers, but most of its activities will be held on evenings and weekends, to make it even more family-friendly. The foundation's Academy for Life offers an outreach program for families based on a model that brings together parents, brothers, sisters, grandparents and others to do art, dance, yoga or other movement exercises.

A creativity program for teens 14 and up uses the arts, drama and dance "to build self-esteem" and physical development.

A third program is centred in the tech room. "Computers are a very good mediation between a person and their environment," Nehama said.

A fourth is aimed at toddlers from two to five, who are encouraged to participate in interactive storytelling and drama.

A speakers series provides information for families and a professional audience.

Nehama has been helping people with disabilities since even before her son was born. "I was known in Israel when I was pregnant. I was part of the committee that created cerebral palsy [CP] treatment in Israel," Nehama said.

Muki was born 54 years ago with CP and deafness. With the help of his admittedly aggressive mother, "Muki broke a lot of barriers in Israel."

Realizing education in his formative years was crucial, she had him enrolled in kindergarten when he was only two and a half. Because of his condition, she found herself at the school every 45 minutes in that first year to help him adapt.

At the time, she found that the Israeli education system could only meet Muki's needs up until high school. Foreseeing difficulties ahead, the family moved to Toronto, and Muki was enrolled in Northern Secondary School on Mount Pleasant Road.

"He had a fantastic time. It was a wonderful school," she said.

Along the way, the Baums adopted a seven-year-old boy, Mark, who has Down Syndrome, and over the years, they served as JF&CS foster parents for eight or nine youngsters, some for a year or two.

Up until 10 years ago, Muki lived on his own, but a spinal problem forced him to move back in with his parents.

Muki and Mark, 38, are great together, Nehama said.

"He takes care of Muki. Mark helps him with his [dinner] plates, and when Mark has a problem with his development, Muki helps him."

It became apparent to Nehama pretty early on that Muki had unique skills in art. At one point as a youngster, Muki designed a New Year's card on a typewriter, using numerous letters to draw "shana tova" on a sheet of paper.

"It was unbelievable. From then I knew he had talent," Nehama said.

In Toronto, he attended art classes at the Koffler Centre of the Arts, where he took to working with clay. He's also an adept painter. His clay art pieces are featured in the calendar that he sells at Lawrence Plaza.

The money he raises goes to help other people, said Einat Enbar, the foundation's director of marketing, fundraising and programs.

"It's tikkun olam," Nehama said. "It's paying it forward, helping people like him but who don't have his kind of support systems."

Sharon recalled as a warrior and peacemaker

JTA

Jewish organizations in Canada and around the world remembered the late Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon as a military leader and a fighter for peace.

David Koschitzky, chair of Canada's Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said: "This is a sad day for the State of Israel and world Jewry. Israel has lost a leader who captured the imagination of the country and led boldly in both war and peace. Sharon had the courage to make difficult decisions.

"As a general, he led Israel's daring counter-thrust against attacking forces in 1973. As defence minister, he led Israel's struggle against terrorism. As prime minister, he unilaterally disengaged Israel from Gaza and parts of the West Bank in the hope of achieving security for Israel, a courageous move considering how much he loved every inch of a country he helped build and defend.

"We salute prime minister Sharon, for his dedication to the land and people of Israel, for his statesmanship, and for his courage in taking bold steps in the search for stability and peace for Israel and its neighbours."

Sharon died Jan. 11 at 85 after eight years in a coma following a massive stroke.

"Ariel Sharon will be remembered for his dedication to the State of Israel and his years of service, both in the army and during his time in politics," said Frank Dimant, CEO of B'nai Brith Canada.

Ariel Sharon [Wikimedia Commons]

"As a general, Ariel Sharon earned the nickname 'Bulldozer' for his no-nonsense attitude and ability to command. He was one of the first to cross the Suez Canal during the 1973 Yom Kippur War, changing the balance of power and hastening the end of the fighting.

"During his time as prime minister, his greatest gamble, unilaterally withdrawing from Gaza, which he had hoped would help push forward the peace process as a sign of goodwill, resulted in the creation of a Hamas-run terrorist enclave. His miscalculation has resulted in almost daily rocket attacks on Israeli civilians in the south and emboldened those who seek to destroy the State of Israel. We regret his loss and look forward to a time when the lives of such men will not be coloured by conflict, but by peace and stability in the region."

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto also mourned Sharon's death. For Toronto's Leslie Gales, a past federation chair and the current chair of UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign, Sharon was a charismatic and charming man who, above all else, loved Israel and the Jewish People.

"I once sat beside him at an event in Israel organized by the Jewish Agency for Israel that welcomed the French who were making aliyah," Gales recalled.

"Most people probably don't realize what a charming and charismatic leader prime minister Sharon really was. I was fortunate to have a seat next to him, and to see the look on his face – one of sheer joy – as he welcomed these people was overwhelming. He was thrilled to welcome them as they started new and proud lives as Jews, at home, in Israel. It was clear from his face, and his words, that everything he did, he did with the best of intentions, and did for the State of Israel."

"He was a bold general on the battlefields of Sinai and a bold prime minister of his beloved State of Israel," said federation president and CEO Ted Sokolsky. "He will never be forgotten as an extraordinary and brave leader of the Jewish people."

Prime Minister Stephen Harper also paid tribute to Sharon.

"On behalf of all Canadians, Laureen and I offer our deepest condolences to the family and friends of former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon and to the Israeli people.

"A renowned military leader, Mr. Sharon pursued the security of Israel with unyielding determination that was recognized by friends and foes alike. He also played a central role in the Israeli government for several years, changing the political landscape through his leadership and vision.

"We join today with those mourning the loss of Ariel Sharon, one of the architects of modern-day Israel and one of the nation's staunchest defenders. Canada values its long-standing relationship with Israel, which is based on shared values, common interests and strong political, economic, cultural and social ties."

Jewish groups in the United States, also mourned with Jewish people everywhere.

Unaffiliated alternative shul turns 40

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

The unaffiliated Congregation Beth Haminyan has been around for four decades, and even some of its members can't believe it's lasted that long.

"It's astonishing that a small shul with no building or paid rabbi or chazzan has survived and thrived for 40 years," says president Elaine Posluns.

On Jan. 18, the congregation will celebrate its 40th anniversary at the Fireside Lounge at Baycrest Terrace.

"It will be a freilech event," says Posluns. "There will be music, singing, reminiscences and film critic Shlomo Schwartzberg will show film clips about Jews in the films."

The Minyan, as it's sometimes called, holds traditional Shabbat morning services at West Preparatory School in Upper Forest Hill. The members lead the davening and participate in the tfillot.

Five times a year, the congregation holds egalitarian services, and more than 300 members attend High Holiday services that are held at Bialik Hebrew Day School.

With an emphasis on continuing education, the members also present lunch and learn seminars and Chumash and Talmud classes throughout the year led by Rabbi Martin Lockshin, Rabbi David Aronson and members.

Elaine Posluns

The minyan was started 40 years ago when the late Ben Grossman, a longtime member of Beth Tzedec Congregation, gathered together a group of friends for a chavurah-style minyan at the synagogue that became known as the "back-room minyan." The following year, Ben and his wife Carrie made aliyah.

The minyan, with its participatory services, continued to expand. The congregation moved to several locations before settling at West Preparatory School.

Posluns told The CJN that the members of Beth Haminyan are very involved in community causes in Canada and Israel. "And we take our Jewish learning very seriously.

"Above all, we have built a community that is participatory and we support each other through good times and bad times. But we also want to extend our welcome to others in the community."

She adds that all their members count in their extended family.

"We know what it's like to be without a safety net in a large city like Toronto, so we have a chesed committee made up of volunteers to assist when help is needed, with shivahs, hospital and home visits, errands, transportation and meals.

"But the highlight for all of us is when we come together to observe and celebrate chagim, often the singing is inspiring and the ruach is palpable.

"After 40 years, Beth Haminyan Congregation is continuing to thrive and grow in members, keep traditions, start new ones and overcome challenges."

2 female suspects sought in murder

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Police in Hallandale Beach, Fla., say it's "only a matter of time before we get [a DNA] match," of two females suspected in the murders of Canadians Donny Pichosky and Rochelle Wise.

Police Chief Dwayne Flournoy, who has been leading the investigation since the Toronto couple was murdered in their Florida winter home last year, told reporters that although police have two DNA profiles they obtained from the crime scene, they don't yet have a match.

Pichosky, 71, and Wise, 66, were found dead Jan. 10, 2013. Flournoy said they were bound and apparently died of asphyxiation. The only thing that had been taken was Wise's wedding band, valued at $16,000.

A month after the murders, police released surveillance video of a mystery woman that showed her walking behind the couple's home around the time of the murder. The police have yet to identify her, but they released a forensic artist's sketch of the woman during the Jan. 8 press conference.

The chief said the murder victims lived in a tight-knit community of snowbirds.

"This is not a very transient community. Everyone knows everyone… With her not being identified and being around the home with two female DNA profiles being inside the crime scene, she is particularly someone we want to speak with," Flournoy said.

Court approves de-funding of CAF

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

A Federal Court judge has upheld an assessment by the former minister of citizenship and immigration that the Canadian Arab Federation (CAF) could reasonably be seen as supporting banned terrorist groups that are anti-Semitic.

The court ruled the minister at the time, Jason Kenney, was within his authority in deciding not to renew funding to the CAF to run an English language program for people new to the country.

The decision upholds a 2009 interim judgment that refused to order the ministry to reinstate funding pending a final outcome in the case.

In February 2009, Kenney became aware that the ministry was providing more than $1 million a year to CAF to run the Language Instruction for Newcomers to Canada (LINC) program.

Kenney asked his chief of staff to "ask the department to bring forward complete information on the contribution embarrassingly approved by our government for the radical and anti-Semitic Canadian Arab Federation," the court recounted.

CAF had asked the court to review the minister's decision to cease funding, arguing it was owed a duty of procedural fairness, that the minister was biased against it, that its right to free expression was abridged by the decision and that the minister's decision was unreasonable.

The court rejected most of the CAF's positions.

The court cited a series of events and statements by CAF officials that were raised by the minister as grounds for his decision:

- a flyer circulated by CAF President Kaled Mouammar, attacking former interim Liberal leader Bob Rae because of his wife's involvement in the Jewish community;
- CAF-organized rallies supporting Hamas and Hezbollah that equated Israelis to Nazis and which included a sign threatening to kill a Jewish child;
- CAF participation in a Cairo conference attended by delegates from Hamas, Hezbollah and other terrorist organizations;
- Internet links to Hamas websites that showed Hamas operatives training;
- honouring Zafar Bangash, who referred to Canadians as infidels; and
- sponsoring an essay contest on the "ethnic cleansing" of Palestine, which the minister took as an allegation that Jewish people were engaged in genocide and which made the contest anti-Semitic.

Paul Calandra, parliamentary secretary to the prime minister, issued a statement saying the court ruling was a victory for common sense:

"Our government's position is clear:

Jason Kenney

organizations that appear to promote hatred, including anti-Semitism, or excuse violence and terrorism do not have the right, and should not expect, to receive tax dollars to deliver government services."

Jewish groups applauded the ruling.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said, "We commend the court for its decision. Given CAF's clear record of glorifying terror groups and spewing hateful rhetoric, Minister Kenney was right to deny it public funding. It's particularly disturbing to think that an organization that holds views so diametrically opposed to Canada's values was given a mandate to integrate new Canadians."

"The court documents clearly point to evidence that the [CAF] is anti-Semitic and promoting extremist views that are a threat to Canada," said Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center.

"Newcomers to this country should be educated about Canadian values of respect and human rights, and not be inspired to form anti-Semitic and hateful opinions. The government of Canada cannot be complicit in this effort, and therefore did the right thing by withdrawing funds from the group... We recommend an additional review by the Canada Revenue Agency of this organization's charitable status," he added.

"The CAFs special brand of anti-Semitic and pro-terror propaganda has only served to hinder the multi-pronged fight to safeguard the Canadian public from the ever-growing problem of radicalization and extremism, both at home and abroad," B'nai Brith Canada said in a statement.

In a statement, CAF president Farid Ayad said that his group "is in the process of appealing the decision and will not make any public statements regarding the decision for the duration of this process."

Don't return to an intolerant Quebec: Goldbloom

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — As Quebec enters another chapter in the debate over the government's proposed values charter, a former Liberal cabinet minister and interfaith dialogue pioneer pleads for the province not to regress to the intolerance of its past.

Ninety-year-old Victor Goldbloom appears in one of two short French-language videos posted earlier this month on YouTube by Christian Jewish Dialogue of Montreal (CJDM).

Over his long life, Goldbloom says he has seen Quebec evolve to "become [an] open and generous and welcoming" society from one of "barriers, constraints and discrimination."

"I would not want to return to the years of constraint that I knew during my youth," he states.

The video, titled Etre québécois, qu'est-ce que ça veut dire? (What does it mean to be Québécois?) is a companion to the CJDM's 3-1/2-minute video Nous sommes québécois, which features individuals representing a variety of origins, religions and ages affirming their Quebec identity and belief that fundamental freedoms are a cornerstone of Quebec society.

Public hearings on Bill 60, the proposed charter, were slated to begin Jan. 14.

Goldbloom, a doctor by profession, was the first Jewish Quebec cabinet minister in the 1970s and the federal Commissioner of Official Languages in the 1990s. He was among the founders of CJDM in 1971 and was president of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region.

In answer to the video title's question, Goldbloom quotes the late René Lévesque as saying, "essentially, 'whoever wants to be a Quebecer is one.'"

The Parti Québécois founder and leader of its first government, who died in 1987, is today revered by many as the spiritual father of the sovereigntist movement.

"I am Victor Goldbloom. I am of the Jewish faith. I am Québécois," he concludes.

The longer video opens with a reciting of the individual liberties protected by the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, including that of conscience, religion, opinion and expression.

Marie-Claude Tremblay, who identifies herself as Jewish, appears in the video Nous sommes québécois.

Fifteen people with names as diverse as Hersimar Singh, Fa Xiang, Shaheen Ashraf, Avrum Dunsky and Marie-Claude Tremblay introduce themselves as "the voices and faces" of Quebecers.

They include a doctor, professor, entrepreneur, artist, student and housewife with faiths ranging from Muslim and Buddhist to Jewish and Baptist, even agnostic and atheist.

To them, Quebec values are respect, inclusiveness, and justice.

The videos were posted just before Christmas, around the same time the PQ released a pamphlet to members called Project de loi 60: Charte des valeurs/Des réponses aux questions de votre famille pour les partys des fêtes! (Bill 60: charter of values/ Answers to your family's questions during the holiday parties!).

It was intended as a handbook on how to answer troublesome points raised by skeptical relatives about the bill, which was tabled in November.

By Jan. 7 when the CJDM videos were officially launched – one week before the start of the public hearings – Nous sommes québécois had had 2,100 views and the Goldbloom followup more than 1,600.

In its brief to the National Assembly committee conducting the Bill 60 hearings, CJDM calls for "a Quebec that is open and welcoming and where Quebecers are free to live their spirituality, whatever form it may take, in their own way."

It expresses concern that the government, in its effort to ensure the religious neutrality of the state, is "trying to silence religions and make them invisible."

CJDM emphasizes that religion should remain an important part of the lives of Quebecers, "inspiring them to work toward peace, social justice and openness towards others.

"These are positive values that should be welcomed in public life, not confined to the private sphere."

CJDM agrees with state neutrality and that employees representing public authority "should set aside [their] religious beliefs in carrying out [their] functions," but it insists that "neutrality and objectivity are in the heart and mind, and in the training received, and not in clothing or religious symbols."

Baird names pro-Israel lawyer as next ambassador

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

A staunch supporter of Israel and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu – and a strong critic of Arab leadership and the United Nations – has been named Canada's next ambassador to the Jewish state.

In a move few expected, Toronto lawyer Vivian Bercovici was named to the post Jan. 8 by Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird. She replaces Paul Hunt, who had held the post from 2011 until this past June. She will not represent Canada to the Palestinian Authority.

In Ottawa, Baird praised the new appointee as "smart and capable and [who] will be able to represent this government well."

The naming of Bercovici, a non-diplomat, to the sensitive post was seen by many as squaring with the Conservative government's well-known support for Israel.

"It won't be a huge shock to anyone that Canada is a strong supporter of Israel," Baird replied to a question about Bercovici's perceived bias against the Palestinian leadership.

In a statement announcing the posting, Baird noted that "having lived in Israel and written extensively on the region, Ms. Bercovici has an excellent understanding of the challenges facing the country and deep insight into the opportunities provided by the strong links between our two countries."

Bercovici, a partner in the Toronto firm of Dickinson Wright, studied at Hebrew University in the early 1980s and was an adjunct law professor at the University of Toronto.

She also wrote a monthly column for the Toronto Star that was unabashedly pro-Israel and often pointed out human rights abuses in the Arab and Palestinian world.

At Wednesday's announcement, Bercovici read from a prepared statement and took no questions from reporters. The CJN's request for an interview was denied.

"My interest in Israel and the region goes back a long way," Bercovici told reporters. "Now is a very important time in the region, as important as ever, and I'm very honoured to be appointed to take on this role. I know that this government's principled stands on various fronts is warmly welcomed and appreciated by both the Israeli government and the Israeli people.

"Canada supports Israel's right to exist in peace and security. Canada stands firm in the international fight against anti-Semitism, including raising awareness of the Holocaust," she said.

"And Canada recognizes the importance of building inclusive and stable societies underpinned by democracy, freedom and human rights and the rule of law."

Reportedly, Ottawa's first choice, former chief of defence staff Walt Natynczyk, turned down the job to head the Canadian Space Agency.

It's not the first time a non-diplomat and a Jew was named ambassador to Israel. Jean Chrétien appointed Liberal MP David Berger to the job, and Brian Mulroney named his former chief of staff, Norman Spector.

Vivian Bercovici and John Baird

Bercovici "is not responsible for relations with the PA and will have no problem representing Canada in Israel," Spector told The CJN in an email, though that "could be a problem if there's a change in government" in Israel.

Her "inexperience in diplomacy [is] more than made up for by familiarity with the country to which she is being posted and other career accomplishments," said Spector, who served as ambassador to Israel from 1992 to 1995 and was the first Jewish Canadian to hold the post.

"It's good to see being Jewish [is] no longer the taboo for such an appointment that it used to be in Canada, the U.S. and [most recently] the U.K.," he stated.

According to her firm's website, Bercovici's practice focuses on insurance regulatory matters, corporate governance, risk management, libel and slander, privacy, aboriginal law, and public policy and legislative advice.

She joined the Dominion of Canada General Insurance Company as a legal executive in 1998 and was promoted to vice-president, general counsel and corporate secretary, a position she held until 2006.

Since 2007, she has served as a chief federal negotiator on various claims made by First Nations against Canada.

In March, she was appointed to the board of directors of CBC/Radio-Canada for a five-year term, and was a director of the Canadian Journalism Foundation from 2004 to 2009.

Her sole government experience appears to have been as senior policy adviser to former Ontario finance minister Ernie Eves from 1995 to 1997.

A mother of two, Bercovici graduated from York University with a BA in English and political science in 1984, earned a diploma from the London School of Economics and Political Science in 1985, and graduated in law from the University of Toronto in 1988. She was called to Ontario's bar in 1990.

Her appointment came as Prime Minister Stephen Harper is finalizing his trip to the Middle East later this month. Bercovici, whose appointment is effective immediately, is expected to be part of the delegation accompanying Harper.

Shimon Fogel and a majority of Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs' (CIJA) board will also accompany Harper, as will several leaders of B'nai Brith Canada.

In her Star columns, she has praised Netanyahu and lashed out against Hamas, the Palestinian leadership and the UN. A sampling:

- The Palestinian Authority and Hamas have a "collective ideological commitment to the total destruction of the state of Israel, which they regard as a blasphemous blight on the Arab and Muslim worlds."
- "It really doesn't matter to [Palestinians] who wins and leads in Israel. There is no willing negotiator on the Palestinian side."
- Western powers "hold on to a misguided fantasy of the Middle East." U.S. President Barack Obama has been "weak" on the Middle East while he "fawned" over Iran.

In a statement, CIJA chair David Koschitzky said, "We offer our warm congratulations to Ambassador Bercovici and are confident she will serve Canada with distinction and honour.

"Ambassador Bercovici is articulate, knowledgeable, and brings a wealth of experience in law and academia. She is well-poised to take the Canada-Israel relationship to the next level for the benefit of both countries, particularly in the areas of trade, energy, science and technology."

Reactions from other Jewish organizations were solicited, but not received.

Israel's new diplomacy

From the Reut Institute

Daphna Kaufman

For the Jewish State, the need to "punch above our weight" diplomatically is not new. A relatively small nation contending with vastly complex challenges, the ability to achieve outsize influence in our global engagement has been crucial to our very survival.

Even when the modern State of Israel was only an idea, Theodor Herzl managed to globally leverage a small and budding movement, which was granted audience with leaders and dignitaries from the Ottoman sultan to the pope.

Upon the founding of the state, scant official diplomatic resources were creatively fortified and amplified. When the foreign ministry of the newly founded modern state first officially opened its doors in May 1948, it boasted just three official employees. Prominent public figures as well as Zionist activists in Diaspora communities were mobilized to represent Israel in some of the most strategic venues to compensate for its limited official diplomatic capacity.

The capacities of the State of Israel have grown immeasurably over time, but so has the sheer complexity of the global environment in which it operates.

Today, we need a vast overhaul of the Jewish state's diplomacy. In fact, a number of developments over recent decades – in Israel and throughout the world – have resulted in change so dramatic that the word "diplomacy" no longer suffices.

These developments have led to a virtual explosion in the numbers and diversity of actors populating an increasingly crowded global stage. A growing number of countries are flexing their political and economic muscle. Non-governmental organizations – from non-profits to corporations – exercise vast influence on global agendas. Transnational organizations, such as NATO, the OECD and the UN, increasingly influence our lives. Publics, en masse, have shown their power, most recently in the massive unrest across the Middle East. And even individuals operating alone, empowered by ever-accessible technology and social networking tools, are able to exert previously unimaginable influence in altering the course of international events.

This dynamic and disorderly reality overwhelms Israel's conventional diplomacy, which lacks the resources and the capacity to effectively pursue the state's interests. Today, Israel needs a global engagement strategy that will harness the diversity and reach of the most potent network in the modern history of the Jewish People.

It's beyond the capacity of the state to build and maintain the necessary quantity and quality of relationships. It's eminently within the reach of a broad network that includes Israeli society and its institutions (for example hospitals, universities and museums); the professionals, philanthropists, entrepreneurs, and volunteers in Jewish communities around the world; and a vibrant Israeli Diaspora that's establishing itself as an influential force in local societies and on Israel.

A global engagement strategy is not a one-way street. Harnessing Israeli society and Jewish communities worldwide to build deep, value- and values-based relationships will influence our very character as well as the way we – the Jewish People – relate to each other. Beyond charting a path for positioning Israel globally, this course may be critical to shape the future of our people.

Who's Orthodox now?

From the Bimah

Rabbi Joe Kanofsky

The truth is that, for better or worse, pretty much all of us are orthodox these days. I know that comes as disappointing news to many, if not most. Still, that's the way it is.

My Oxford English Dictionary (OED) defines "orthodox" as "right in opinion," and gives a derivation of the word from two Greek roots: orthos, meaning "straight or right" (think of "orthodontia") and doxos, meaning "belief or opinion."

So stop thinking for a moment about black hats, beards and protests in Israel. The truth is that, in all probability, you and most everyone you know are in fact orthodox. I find that if I talk long enough with almost any Jew, with very few exceptions, he or she will eventually admit that he or she feels that they're really in the right, and mostly everyone else is missing the boat. Each Jew thinks that he or she has the "straight or right belief or opinion," and that's called "orthodox," according to my OED.

I know what you're thinking. Orthodox really means those deeply pious, fervently observant, very religious Jews (usually defined as the entire spectrum to the right of me). Yet if you listen closely to the way people name themselves, most Jews you might call "Orthodox" don't self-identify as such. "Frum," "shomer Shabbos," "haimish," "Torah-true," "dati," and "ehrlich" are more common internal identifiers, much more so than "Orthodox," which was originally invented as a derogatory epithet by 19th-century German Reformers. But that isn't what we're talking about here.

Nor are we talking about the phenomenon of "open Orthodoxy," which has garnered a lot of press recently. Never mind the subtle yet clearly implicit dismissal of the rest of the Orthodox world as "closed," which is a classic straw man argument and a common feint in Jewish polemics. Never mind that most of the rest of the Orthodox world is uncomfortable with "OO" – that deserves a column all its own, if there's anything left to say after the blogosphere has taken up all the oxygen in the room. However, I once saw a shul that self-identified as "open haredi" – now that is an interesting proposition.

One of the plagues of contemporary Judaism is our orthodoxy – not big-O Orthodoxy, the common shorthand for Torah-observant Judaism. To the contrary, that, in all probability, is our link to the Jewish future as surely as it's our link to the Jewish past (read the demographic studies if you don't believe me).

No, I'm talking about the triumphalism of each of our own little orthodoxies, the notion that only I have it right, and thus have nothing to learn from the experience or insight of others.

It's very tempting to wrap ourselves in a cloak of self-righteous confidence in the "rightness" of our convictions and our views. I know you think that I'm talking about everybody else – if only that were the case. I know people of just about every denominational and institutional affiliation who are afflicted to some degree or another. Paradoxically, it's quite often those who profess the most "openness" and pluralism who are in fact the most closed to any view but their own.

The talmudic tradition gives us ample evidence of how to hold fast to one's own views and at the same time be able to hear someone else's argument, and as a result emerge a wiser, more fully human, and perhaps even more well-informed person and Jew. It's a model from which we can learn a great deal.

CHAI TEA & A MOVIE:
ZAYTOUN

"A masterpiece of peace, hope and endless possibilities." (Huffington Post) Filmmaker Eran Riklis' (Lemon Tree, Human Resources Manager) tells a touching and inspiring story about survival, reconciliation and friendship set in war-torn 1982 Beirut, Lebanon. Ten-year-old Fahed lives in poverty with his father and grandfather in the Shatila Palestinian Refugee Camp. Bright and street-smart, he and his friends meet Yoni, an imprisoned fighter pilot of the Israeli Air Force. When circumstances pit Fahed and Yoni together, they must overcome the fierce hatred, raw emotion and intolerance built up over generations in order to survive.

Battle of the bands

Jewish & Digital
Mark Mietklewicz

While the recent vote by the American Studies Association to boycott Israel – and the resulting backlash – have been making headlines, another boycott by musicians and artists has been long simmering and is at least as intriguing. Today, a look at the fascinating fight to convince some of the biggest names in show business to visit – or boycott – Israel.

One of the most vocal supporters of a boycott is Roger Waters, former front man of the English rock band, Pink Floyd. "I write to you now, my brothers and sisters in the family of Rock and Roll, to ask you to join with me, and thousands of other artists around the world, to declare a cultural boycott on Israel." [http://bit.ly/boycott1]

Some musicians agree: Annie Lennox, Stevie Wonder, Mos Def, Faithless, Santana, Snoop Dogg and Brian Eno. [bit.ly/boycott2]

Others have performed in Israel: Lady Gaga, Black Eyed Peas, Alanis Morissette, Alicia Keys, Paul McCartney, Leonard Cohen and Elton John, who said, "Musicians spread love and peace, and bring people together. That's what we do. We don't cherry-pick our conscience." [bit.ly/boycott11]

The Pixies, an American alternative rock band, had been scheduled to perform in Tel Aviv in June 2010. They cancelled a week after the Israeli raid on the Mavi Marmara, the Turkish ship bound for Gaza, that left nine activists dead. "The decision was not reached easily," the band said. "We can only hope for better days, in which we will finally present the long-awaited visit of the Pixies in Israel." [bit.ly/boycott3]

Apparently those better days are almost here, as the Pixies have announced they will play in Israel this June.

As soon as artists reveal their intention to perform in Israel, online appeals appear to convince them otherwise:

- To The Pixies: "Stay on the right side of history and say no to Israeli apartheid." [bit.ly/boycott4]
- To Alicia Keys: "Don't Play Apartheid Israel on July 4, 2013 in Tel Aviv." [bit.ly/boycott5]
- To Cirque du Soleil: "No Sunshine in Apartheid. Don't jump thru Israel's hoops." [bit.ly/boycott7]

Behind the scenes, organizations have sprung up to lobby musicians to either side of the divide.

The Palestinian Campaign for the Academic and Cultural Boycott of Israel states that "virtually all Israeli cultural institutions, unless proven otherwise, are complicit in maintaining the Israeli occupation and denial of basic Palestinian rights, whether through their silence or actual involvement in justifying, whitewashing or otherwise deliberately diverting attention from Israel's violations of international law and human rights." [bit.ly/boycott6]

Meanwhile, the Creative Community for Peace presents an online petition with a message that starts, "Dear Artist, We, the undersigned, wholeheartedly support your upcoming tour in Israel and your dedication to your fans across the globe…" There's a "celebrity sightings" page: John Malkovich at Ben-Gurion airport, Guy Ritchie with Israeli President Shimon Peres, Claire Danes at the Kotel, etc. And a page offering assistance to artists considering touring the country. [bit.ly/boycott8]

The decision about performing in Israel has cut through the musical community, with colleagues – and even family members – taking opposite stands. Citing "intimidation, humiliation or much worse on Palestinian civilians," Elvis Costello cancelled two performances in Israel in May 2010. [bit.ly/boycott9] Costello is married to Diana Krall who performed in Ra'anana two months later. [bit.ly/boycott10]

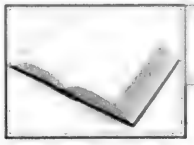
Sephardi-Ashkenazi unity inspires

Rabbi Shalom Spira



Rabbinic Reflections

In his commentary to this week's parashah, Rashi cites the Mechilta (Exodus 19:2) that the Jewish People was united at Mount Sinai like one person with a single heart.

This inspiring scene is experienced in many synagogues today where Sephardim and Ashkenazim harmoniously pray together. Rabbi Moshe Feinstein (Iggerot Mosheh, Orach Chaim 4:33) encourages such multi-ethnic unity, invoking the verse, "I am a friend to all those who fear You and to those whose observe Your commandments" (Psalms 119:63). Pursuant to the fourth chapter of Pesachim, where the Talmud explains how to manage divergent customs among Jews, Rabbi Feinstein explains (in this responsum as well as others) that visitors must conform to the established protocol of the synagogue in all publicly observed conduct. Thus, for example, I follow the Moroccan customs of my synagogue regarding the audibly chanted prayers, whereas I recite the private silent Amidah following my personal Ashkenazi heritage.

Similarly, Rabbi Naftali Zvi Yehudah Berlin (Teshuvot Meshiv Davar 3:10) envisages the diversity of synagogue liturgy as being subsumed under the rubric of the following talmudic exposition (Pesachim 53b): "'And your people are all righteous, they shall inherit the land forever,' (Isaiah 60:21) – whether they said to light [a candle before sunset on Yom Kippur eve] or whether they said not to light, they both intended for the same goal." Rashi explains that the two contradictory customs are both oriented toward family separation, one of the five mandatory afflictions, on Yom Kippur. So, too, writes Rabbi Berlin: both the Sephardi and Ashkenazi liturgies are righteous and pleasing to Heaven.

The unity experienced by Jewry at Sinai, so palpable in our cosmopolitan synagogues, should not only move us Jews, but should also beneficially influence humanity. After all, the Talmud (Zevachim 116a), in expounding upon Psalm 29, reports that all the nations of the world heard the Revelation at Sinai. A parallel description is provided by the Shofarot blessing of Musaf for Rosh Hashanah. To that effect, I personally find it instructive how verse 6 of that psalm reads, "And He caused Lebanon and Syria to dance like a calf." Rashi comments that the Lebanese/Syrian forests and mountains were trembling with excitement when they heard the giving of the Torah.

Accordingly, given the present civil war afflicting Syria, which has also affected Lebanon, it seems to me that the time has arrived for Lebanon and Syria to truly "dance like a calf," much as they did many millennia ago.

Namely, I invite the leaders of the warring sides to reflect as a matter of conscience on the unity that was experienced by Jewry at Sinai. The Syrian government should consider graciously negotiating a diplomatic solution with its opponents.

All it needs for inspiration is to look south of the border and watch with amazement how Sephardim and Ashkenazim pray together in unity. For as both Sephardim and Ashkenazim recite in the High Holiday liturgy, "let them all become a united bundle to fulfil Your will with a full heart."

Rabbi Shalom Spira is spiritual leader of Congregation Kol Yehouda in Cote St. Luc, Que.

Ariel Sharon: man of action

David Horovitz
The Times of Israel

Analysis

It's no accident that they called him 'The Bulldozer.' As a soldier and as a politician, Ariel Sharon was a man of action. Usually for better, sometimes for worse, he was a man who got things done.

Abducting Jordanian soldiers in the 1950s. Crossing the Suez Canal and never allowing himself to be rocked backward in the desperate chaos of 1973. Invading Lebanon beyond the prime ministerial mandate in 1982. Building settlements. Building homes for Soviet immigrants. Dismantling settlements and departing Gaza. And, toward the end, gearing up to do what might need to be done to thwart Iran, and preparing to try to determine Israel's West Bank borders.

If, early in life, the military man of action was impulsive and hard to restrain, Sharon the prime minister was more polished and subtle. No longer a bulldozer, but still, critically, proactive.

And that was the secret of his astounding late-life popularity among Israelis. He had appalled the left by invading Lebanon. He had horrified the right by dismantling the entire settlement enterprise in Gaza, and he had given signs that he might countenance a far-reaching West Bank withdrawal too, if it could be done while maintaining what he deemed Israel's vital security needs. And others had been alienated by the never-proven corruption allegations that swirled around him.

Yet he became a beloved prime minister, a trusted prime minister, a repeatedly electable prime minister, because of that restless determination to act to protect this country and its people. The figure once beyond the pale – stripped of his beloved defence minister's job for failing to anticipate and prevent the 1982 Sabra and Shatila massacre in Lebanon – had metamorphosed into Israel's indefatigable political superman. He was so much larger than life that almost everybody believed him when he instantly returned from the first, minor stroke, assuring us that it was nothing… and no matter that he was 77 and extremely overweight.

It is Sharon the indomitable man of action that so many Israelis feel distraught to have lost now – or, more accurately, eight years ago. He was, late in life, likable and gracious and considerate; he had always been rapier smart and spectacularly courageous. But it is the loss of Sharon's proactive qualities that is most being mourned, because it is these qualities that are in shortest supply among those he has left behind.

He wasn't always right, not even in those last, super-productive prime ministerial years. Unilateralism, most notably, lies buried under the rubble of the rockets that follow Israel when it leaves enemy territory without solid partnerships.

But he was always striding ahead: he got on with the business of leading Israel – pulled out his maps and his plans, charted his course, galvanized others. He exuded competence. He broadcast a spectacularly comforting – if not always justified – certainty that his way was the correct way, and that if Israel fell into line behind him, everything would turn out fine. While all around was hesitation, Ariel Sharon was moving forward.

This is a lousy region. It's full of bloodshed and cynicism and religious extremism. The international community has largely had enough of it. Most of the world understandably prefers to run rather than get sucked into fixing it. And if Israel can be misrepresented as a source, even the source, of the Middle East's intractable awfulness, well, that assuages the guilt a little.

So Iran, outrageously, is on the cusp of becoming a nuclear threshold state, its rapacious ideological and territorial ambitions tolerated, its open hostility to Israel indulged, because the alternative is just so awkward and demanding. So Syrian President Bashar Assad gets to survive and keep on massacring his people, while a once-admirable opposition becomes increasingly radical. And the Palestinian conflict lingers on, the relative moderates too scared to defy the single-minded extremists.

And our Israeli leaders, when they aren't bickering among themselves or seeking to outmanoeuvre each other, complain bitterly and plaintively and protractedly about the unfairness of it all – the terrible international deals with Iran, the lack of will over Syria, the exaggerated empathy for the intransigent Palestinians. Defensive, reactive, they try to muddle through, to minimize the damage, to find the least bad of the options and the courses that others are imposing upon them.

Whereas Sharon would have said two things: First, "Chevre, look how far we've come." And, second, "Chevre, this is what we're going to do now. Come on. To work."

He continued: "Arik, you were a rare man. You turned the impossible into great opportunities. Rest in peace, great leader."

Sharon and current Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu did not always agree with each other, Netanyahu admitted during his eulogy, but they served in each other's governments and supported each other "for Israel's sake," he said.

Netanyahu called Sharon "one of the greatest generals that the Jewish People and the Israel Defence Forces had ever known."

Shimon "Kacha" Kahaner, who fought alongside Sharon in the fabled Unit 101 in the 1950s, called Sharon, "my commander, teacher and rabbi.

"Arik's strength came from his love of the land, and from what the land gave him. It was a two-way relationship," Kahaner recalled.

Ze'ev "Zambish" Hever, a settler leader and close friend, called Sharon a "hero of Israel," and called his last two years in office, referring to the expulsion from Gaza settlements, "painful and difficult."

"The questions go unanswered. But as you commanded, we will not give up. We will not give up," he said.

Some 1,000 guests attended the public funeral, including Knesset members, cabinet ministers, the military leadership, and 21 delegations from other countries.

Sharon's casket was taken to the Latrun Armored Corps Memorial Site and Museum, where 15 IDF major generals saluted the late military and political leader.

The convoy then continued to Sharon's Sycamore Ranch in the Negev for a private funeral attended by family and close friends, after which Sharon was to be buried next to his wife, Lily.

Is anti-Semitic French comic bringing his act to Canada?

Nazi hunter slams Dieudonné's latest show

Elias Levy
Staff Reporter

"Dieudonné is not a humourist, but a fierce anti-Semite and a propagator of hate," noted French historian and Nazi hunter Serge Klarsfeld says.

Klarsfeld spoke to The CJN last week about the controversial Franco-Camaroon humourist, whose anti-Semitic antics have made headlines recently, as French Interior Minister Manuel Valls took legal measures to ban the comic's new, openly anti-Semitic live show, Le Mur (The Wall) which he was to perform in some 20 French cities over the next few weeks.

Klarsfeld urged his fellow Frenchmen to demonstrate against Dieudonné's latest show, and the appeal seems to have struck a chord, because Le Mur was cancelled by the prefects of several of the cities involved.

"Dieudonné's despicable behaviour shows the virulence of his anti-Semitism and of certain forms of Judeophobia, notably in his mocking the Holocaust, an appalling tragedy that had an important place in Fench and European history," Klarsfeld said in an interview from his home in Paris.

"You can't make fun with impunity of the innocent Jewish victims who were exterminated in the Nazi gas chambers, but Dieudonné says he regrets that [the gas chambers] are no longer running at full capacity," Klarsfeld added.

"I stepped into the breach, because you can't accept in a democracy that a man like Dieudonné, with his offensive show and his multiple convictions for inciting racial hatred… can be on tour in 22 cities in France to present a nauseatingly anti-Semitic show that will bring him a lot of money and reinforce the anti-Semitism of those who attend the gruesome performance. [His] shows have only one objective: to break the Jew."

Asked about the how the French justice system is handling the issue, Klarsfeld said, "I think the magistrates already involved in this affair are referring it to the Conseil d'État, the highest administrative court in France… For the moment, one thing is certain – Le Mur will not be presented in France and Dieudonné has been silenced. He will be stopped. But if he can't do the show in France, he will present it in other countries, maybe in Canada."

Dieudonné's last attempt to perform in Quebec in 2012 was cancelled at the last minute after the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs protested to the owners of the Montreal theatre where he was scheduled to appear.

"I am delighted that Quebecers showed such good judgment," Klarsfeld said.

There are many who think Dieudonné's latest show shouldn't be banned, because it would be a flagrant attack on free expression and because he would portray himself as a martyr fighting the Jewish, Zionist lobby, but Klarsfeld strongly refuted this argument.

"Everyone knows that Dieudonné is an anti-Jew disguised as an anti-Zionist. Those who defend him in the name of freedom of expression… do so because Dieudonné attacks the Jews so ferociously," he said.

"But let's not kid ourselves. In Dieudonné's case, there is no attack against freedom of expression, because his is clearly a criminal opinion, and… because inciting racial hatred or the denial of a crime against humanity falls under the section of French law forbidding incitement to racial hatred. Thus, if Dieudonné's words are against the law, freedom of expression is no longer in question."

Klarsfeld said the very controversial rally gesture known as the "Quenelle" – an inverted Nazi salute popularized by Dieudonné in his shows that has been adopted by many French athletes and young people – is not an "anti-system" gesture, but is basically anti-Semitic.

Klarsfeld said Dieudonné cynically exploits the economic crisis in France to make Jews the scapegoats who, in the comic's opinion, are responsible for the country's economic and social evils, echoing the atmosphere in France in the 1930s and '40s.

"Politicians on the extreme right and a demagogue like Dieudonné shamelessly manipulate those most affected by the economic crisis, primarily the young immigrant Muslims and blacks living in the suburbs… by hammering at them that the only ones responsible for their existential economic problems are the Jews. The anti-Semitic stereotypes in vogue in the '30s and '40s are rebounding with force today in French society."

Dieudonné's supporters – those who go to his shows – are "radical, fiercely anti-Zionist followers of Islam," Klarsfeld said.

"All the confirmed 'Dieudonnistes' have a common denominator: they are anti-Israel and anti-Jew. They are convinced that the Jewish multimillionaires and powerful Jewish financial leaders are in a plot against the French working classes and the whole world. Their world vision is repugnant and frightening."

Comedian cancels tour

JTA

PARIS — Amid an investigation into his finances and bans on his shows because of anti-Semitic content, French comedian Dieudonné M'bala M'bala said he's abandoning his nationwide tour.

Dieudonné made the announcement Jan. 11 at a news conference in which he appeared dressed in traditional West African garb.

"Today, a page is turned and I am switching to other things," the comedian said in reference to his new show, The Wall, which he was supposed to take on tour beginning Jan. 9. The tour ground to a halt after France's highest court upheld a ban on the show imposed by several municipalities.

His announcement also followed reports that French authorities suspect he is hiding revenues to avoid paying $89,000 in fines that have been imposed on him for inciting racial hatred against Jews, an offence for which he has been convicted seven times.

Legally speaking, Dieudonné is penniless and unable to pay the debts, yet his shows at the Main D'Or theatre in Paris are sold out, RTL reported.

French authorities reportedly suspect that he colluded with associates to give the impression of bankruptcy. In addition, French Interior Minister Manuel Valls was filmed saying on Jan. 7 that Dieudonné "was financed by Iran, after all."

Dieudonné told reporters, "As we are living in a state with laws, of course one needs to conform to the law." He spoke in a serious tone and without the false expressions of regret for spreading anti-Semitic ideas that have become his trademark in past appearances.

"In my work as a humourist, I have tried to push the boundaries of the public debate and of laughter, and the judiciary has expressed its position on this," he said in reference to a ruling on Jan. 9 by France's highest court that banned him from performing in the western city of Nantes.

"I have angered many people and I will continue to do so, through laughter."

Despite his seven convictions for inciting racial hatred against Jews, Dieudonné said, "Clearly, I am not a Nazi. I'm not an anti-Semite."

A timeline of Ariel Sharon's life

JTA

1928 – Born Ariel Sheinerman in Kfar Malal, near Tel Aviv.

1948 – Wounded while serving as an infantry commander in Israel's War of Independence.

1953 – Founder and commander of the Unit 101 anti-terror force, which carries out raids in retaliation against Arab attacks. One raid by Unit 101 leaves 69 dead in the Jordanian-controlled West Bank village of Qibya and draws international condemnation.

1954-57 – Commander of a paratroop brigade that captures the strategic Mitla Pass during the 1956 Sinai War with Egypt.

1964-65 – The Israel Defence Forces chief of staff, Yitzhak Rabin, appoints him to be chief of staff for the Northern Command.

1967 – During the Six Day War, commands an armoured division in the Sinai Desert and directs a battle that successfully recaptures the Mitla Pass and the corridor to the Suez Canal.

1969-73 – Heads the IDF's Southern Command. After August 1970, focuses on fighting Palestinian terrorism in Gaza.

1973 – Retires from the military to pursue political career and works at establishing the Likud party. With outbreak of Yom Kippur War, returns to active military service to command an armoured division that crosses the Suez Canal.

1976 – Forms the Shlomtzion party. The party wins two Knesset seats, but soon merges into the Likud.

April 1982 – Carries out last phase of Israeli evacuation from northern Sinai as part of peace agreement with Egypt.

1984-90 – Serves as minister for industry and trade in national unity government.

1990-92 – Named minister for construction and housing in a Likud-based government formed by Yitzhak Shamir.

1999 – Netanyahu resigns as Likud leader and appoints Sharon as caretaker. Sharon later wins the position outright in a party vote.

Sept. 28, 2000 – Sharon visits the Temple Mount in Jerusalem and Palestinian riots erupt, marking start of second intifadah.

2001 – Sharon wins prime ministerial election in a landslide, garnering 62 per cent of the vote to Barak's 38 per cent. He forms a unity government with the Labor party.

2002 – After escalation of Palestinian suicide bombings in the second intifadah, Sharon launches Operation Defensive Shield and Operation Determined Path. Sharon also begins construction of a separation barrier between the West Bank, Gaza and Israel.

Moshe Dayan and Sharon in Sinai near the Suez Canal during the Yom Kippur War

January 2003 – Sharon wins a second term as prime minister, and Likud doubles its Knesset faction to 38 seats.

December 2003 – Sharon surprises his base by announcing disengagement plan, wherein Israel would withdraw fully from the Gaza Strip, relocating almost 10,000 settlers.

November 2004 – Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat dies. Sharon says he will meet with the new Palestinian leadership, but continues advancing his disengagement plan.

July 2005 – The IDF executes the disengagement plan, encountering widespread civil disobedience but little violence from settlers. Sharon addresses the Israeli public.

November 2005 – Facing opposition from the Likud due to the disengagement, Sharon breaks off from his party and forms the centrist Kadima party ahead of the 2006 elections.

Jan. 4, 2006 – Sharon suffers the second of two strokes in quick succession, leaving him in a vegetative state.

Jan. 11, 2014 – After eight years in a coma, Sharon dies from multiple organ failure at age 85.

Entrepreneur helps filmmakers find sets for videos

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

When Hedley showed up to film a music video around the backyard pool of a residence in the Bathurst and St. Clair area, the homeowners kept out of the way, though their curious faces could be seen peering out the window at the shenanigans going on below.

There were lights, camera, supermodels and, needless to say, action, but at the end of the day, when the film crew packed up and loaded their equipment, there was barely any evidence that the home had been the site of a killer video. Oh, and there was a cheque for the homeowners that made the experience that much sweeter.

Though there certainly is excitement to be found at a music video shoot, or for a commercial for that matter, it's the more tangible money in your pocket that Alex Kolodkin is counting on to make his venture a success.

Kolodkin, 24, is founder of Set Scouter, a start-up company whose name tells it all: it's in the business of matching sets with filmmakers. The sets can be, as was the case in midtown Toronto, someone's home, a condo, a commercial office space, and occasionally a farm, but most often they're residential locations. The sets are venues for music videos, commercials, TV pilots and low-budget or student films.

Kolodkin's company is certainly not the only game in town, but he feels he's carving out a niche by catering to small to medium-sized clients and by offering a solution at a fraction of the cost offered by more established players.

He's got the Internet to thank for that. In his business plan, the shidduch (the match) is made online between client and provider, matching supply and demand. These days, demand is far outstripping supply.

People with properties available to rent can list them on the Set Scouter website, along with a photo; businesses can browse the site to see if there's anything that matches their needs.

Fees range from a few hundred dollars to $5,000 per day, making it affordable for Kolodkin's target market.

"Right now, a filmmaker can browse and request locations for free, homeowners can list their location in less than 10 minutes, and they can set price, availability and send in their own photos. We're the Airbnb of the film industry," he said, referring to the online service that matches travellers with people's homes in their vacation destination.

"We're making it easier to match filmmakers with the location owner."

The filmmaker can speak directly with the homeowner and send someone to check out the property in person. But all financial transactions go through Set Scouter.

The company charges the film companies a five per cent service fee, while homeowners receive 85 per cent of their asking price. Set Scouter, which is based out of the Digital Media Zone at Ryerson University, gets 15 per cent from the homeowner to go along with the five per cent from the filmmaker.

"We only get paid when the transaction is complete," Kolodkin said.

Big budget film companies have been scouting locations for eons, but hiring people to do the legwork can cost $650 a day. For smaller companies, indies, TV commercial-makers, Set Scouter offers a reasonable alternative.

Kolodkin, who graduated from Ryerson University with a master of arts in media production, happened upon the idea for his business almost by accident. It seemed the film industry was advancing in so many ways, except when it came to locating sets. In that, it was stuck in the past, cold-calling people and inquiring about availability.

The larger companies had access to expensive catalogues of potential venues, but the smaller players had to rely on legwork or even posting requests on Facebook. Kolodkin came up with the idea for a less costly and more efficient way of finding sets.

Even before, he had found in a variety of jobs in the industry that "my skill set was understanding the business side of TV production and helping producers get their stories funded and greenlit [approved]."

"I said, I'll put one year of tuition into it and treat this as a learning opportunity."

That amounted to some $15,000 of his own money. He incorporated Set Scouter in October 2012 in partnership with Lidia Bit-Yunan, a friend from school, and hired developers to create the website. They launched the service in August 2013.

With the business still in its early stages, it has yet to turn a profit and Kolodkin has gone beyond the one year he was giving himself to see if it would work.

He has signed up an impressive board of advisers of knowledgeable people in the film world, but he relies greatly on his mom, Ella Kolodkina, for advice.

The Kolodkins, who emigrated from Ukraine when Alex was one year old, had always told their son he needed to get a job. But when he discussed the one-year time frame with his mom, she said, "'You're continuing to do this,'" Alex recounted. "'Look at the traction you're getting,' and she said, 'Continue on.' She's giving me her continuing support to execute on what my goals are."

"She immigrated from [the Soviet Union] when I was one. She came to Canada with almost nothing in her pocket and she instilled in me that anything is possible."

The Hedley video marked a good start to the business. The video maker went home happy, the homeowners earned what amounted to "found money" and despite the rather explicit goings-on, nothing was damaged.

And the name of the music video being shot that day couldn't be more appropriate, as far as Kolodkin is concerned. It's for a song called Anything, and features a chorus that belts out the message, "I can do anything."

Klein Halevi's book is a journalistic tour de force

Like Dreamers: The Story of the Israeli Paratroopers who Reunited Jerusalem and Divided a Nation
Yossi Klein Halevi
HarperCollins

Mordechai Ben-Dat
Special to The CJN

What can we learn about a complex structure of nature when we examine only a partial fractal? Indeed, as scientists will attest, apparently, a great deal. Although, they will also caution, not necessarily the entire story. The examination itself, however, can be exhilarating, eye-opening and provocative, yielding dazzling new perspectives about accepted beliefs and assumptions.

The device of science that has proven to be so helpful in matters pertaining to physics, geology and geography for example, has now, thanks to Yossi Klein Halevi, also proven its worth in social and political commentary.

Through the brilliant use – as a diagnostic fractal – of the lives of seven Israeli men, Klein Halevi examines and reports upon the political, cultural, economic, social and other incendiary eruptions of life we know as Israeli society.

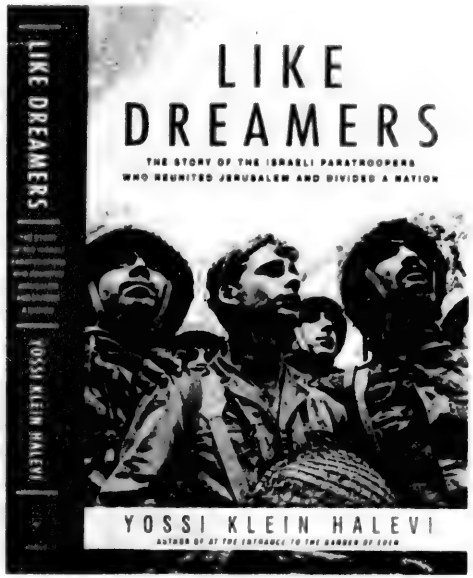
But these are not simply any men. They were all paratroopers who served with the storied 55th Paratroopers Brigade that achieved the reunification of Jerusalem in the Six Day War.

No singular outcome from those memorably fraught six days stirred the souls of the Jewish people—in Israel and around the world—more than the bringing down of the concrete and barbed wire barriers that had divided Jerusalem. When Jewish soldiers in June 1967 stood upon the Temple Mount and at the Western Wall, they restored Jewish sovereignty to the eternal city from which Jews had been forcibly displaced some 2,000 years ago.

Klein Halevi chose this seminal event as his starting point. He also deliberately chose men who were idealists and dreamers. Each in his own way strove to build a utopian place that would be an example of human possibility, social justice and existential purpose for the benefit of the entire world.

Four of the paratroopers are secular kibbutzniks. Three are religious Zionists. "Among the religious Zionists portrayed here," Klein Halevi tells us, "one founded the first West Bank settlement, while another became the settlement movement's great heretic." The third became the movement's public voice.

"Among the kibbutzniks, one helped found Peace Now and then abandoned the movement. Improbably, one former kibbutznik became a pioneer in the transition from a state-run economy to free-enterprise Israel. Another emerged as Israel's leading poet-singer, a bohemian symbol who then became an observant Jew." The fourth, a zealot of his own radical ideology, was charged and convicted of espionage against the state.



LIKE DREAMERS
THE STORY OF THE ISRAELI PARATROOPERS WHO REUNITED JERUSALEM AND DIVIDED A NATION
YOSSI KLEIN HALEVI

Klein Halevi chronicles the men's interconnected lives from that transformative moment in 1967 until the early years of the second millennium. In the process, he also connects these individual intersections to the wider changes that occurred in Israel over that same period. As Klein Halevi observes, "these men not only helped define the political debate of post-'67 Israel but also its social and cultural transformations."

Klein Halevi shines an illuminating light upon Israel's history from 1967 to 2004 as refracted through the very different prisms of the lives of these paratroopers. He makes no claim to writing comprehensive or definitive history. That was not his purpose. Nor, he readily admits, are the individuals he chose for his journalistic enterprise representative of Israel society at large.

Rather, it was because these men in particular embodied two uniquely contending Israeli ideals—the kibbutz Zionist ideal and the yeshiva Zionist ideal—that Klein Halevi chose them. As the author explains, "this book tells the story, through the lives of the paratroopers, of Israel's competing utopian dreams—and how the Israel symbolized by the kibbutz became the Israel symbolized by the settlement."

Klein Halevi writes each man's story, often with surprisingly intimate detail, in a manner that conveys the full personal and professional trajectory of their lives. They clearly invited Klein Halevi into their innermost emotional and intellectual sanctums of thoughts, plans, aspirations, angers and doubts. And true to his purpose, Klein Halevi records them in a forthright, tight manner that lets the information finds its own way to the reader under its own literary weight without his having to steer it aggressively, without subtlety, to the front of the reader's mind.

By the end of the story we feel we truly know the men and many other figures who play major roles in their lives.

Klein Halevi records the men's private and public reactions to so many of the key historical events that took place during the 40 years chronicled by Like Dreamers. We see them respond to the four wars Israel fought during those years, Anwar Sadat's dream-like visit to Jerusalem, the unilateral Israeli evacuation from the Sinai, the murder by a Jew of anti-war protester Emil Gruensweig, the intifadah of the late 1980s, the numerous acts of murder and terrorism directed at Israel's citizens, the signing of the Oslo Accords and the assassination, again by a Jew, of Yitzhak Rabin.

More than 10 years in the making, Like Dreamers is a journalistic tour de force. With this work, Klein Halevi joins a select company of reporters such as Ben Hecht, John Steinbeck, Martha Gellhorn and Harry Bruce, to name but a few, who depicted current events as literary journalism.

The sheer volume of interview notes and research underlying the four-decade sweep of events must have been massive as well as substantively widely disparate. Yet Klein Halevi has crafted a moving and remarkable masterpiece with it all.

Like Dreamers is primarily about the ongoing struggle by Israelis – indeed, by all thoughtful individuals who care deeply about Israel's future – to reconcile among themselves competing, though not necessarily conflicting, ideas about progress, societal advancement and human redemption.

Klein Halevi concludes that the "new dreams of Zion had each successively faltered." But he does not write that they have failed. For the labour of fulfilling the dreams of a utopian society, of bringing the messiah to a better world, is ongoing. And like Klein Halevi and the paratroopers of whom he wrote, we have not yet lost our hope in doing so.

Montreal auctioneer Rogo bids for TV spotlight

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Every good auctioneer is a bit of a showman and, after more than 25 years in the business, Eddy Rogo is used to performing in front of large audiences.

But nothing, he says, compares to being one of the stars of the new CBC reality television series Four Rooms, where contestants try to get the best price for their unusual and often very valuable items from the four professional dealers on the show each week.

Rogo is co-owner of Empire Auctions which runs monthly auctions, from its Montreal and Toronto locations, of valuables and collectibles, from antiques and art to fine housewares to vintage toys and rare automobiles.

Four Rooms, which debuted Jan. 5, continues for eight episodes on Sunday nights at 8 p.m.

Rogo describes Four Rooms as "a cross between Antiques Roadshow and Dragons' Den," with an important difference.

"On [PBS's] Antiques Roadshow, dealers evaluate what an item could be worth or could go for at auction. On Four Rooms, our offers are concrete. There is a cheque on the spot," he said.

CBC went across the country looking for contestants with interesting things to sell who are also interesting people.

The four dealers did not know in advance what items would be presented to them at each show (all episodes were taped.) From the initial encounter, the canny contestant should judge which dealer is likely to make them the sweetest offer.

Each dealer then shows a bid to the viewing audience that is not seen by their fellow dealers before going into their respective "rooms."

The contestant decides the order in which he or she enters a room. They can accept the first offer, try to negotiate a better offer, or move to another room, or three more rooms.

It's a gamble, because they can't go back to an earlier dealer if theirs was a better offer. If they turn down an offer, it's off the table for good.

Sculptor matches her art with buyers' homes

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Lee Lessem has never had to advertise her naked ladies. The papier-mâché sculptures are in such demand, she's been selling them as fast as she's been making them for 20 years now.

"There's nothing more beautiful [than the female body]," she said. "We are perfection, whether we're fat, thin, tall, big-breasted."

The South Africa-born artist speaks about her sculptures as if they're all real women.

"They're all in my head waiting to be born," said Lessem, adding that as soon as she visualizes the figure, she finds a name that suits the personality she sees in it.

These are highly time consuming projects. Each sculpture takes her three months to make.

Lessem, who is also a painter, began sculpting 20 years ago when she moved with her husband to Houston, Texas. While she waited for her furniture to arrive, she stayed in a very small room – not big enough for her to paint on the big canvases that she was used to.

"I didn't know what to do. I need to be creative," she said.

She called her mother, who suggested she take up sculpting. Using paper was simple, and great for a small space. Although she had never worked in three-dimensional art before, she decided to take up that challenge.

"You've always got to listen to your mummy," she said.

She started sculpting the figure of a woman by taking small pieces of paper and sticking layer upon layer using homemade glue, massaging the pieces until they were smooth.

While she was working on it, she met an art collector, who asked her how much she wanted for the figure.

"I said, 'It's not even done, it's really bad.' And she said, 'Art is a matter of opinion. I think it is absolutely magnificent,'" she said.

Her success all stemmed from that lucky meeting. That woman showed the sculpture to her friends, who then bought pieces and passed on Lessem's information to their own friends. Soon after, Lessem had a long waiting list of people.

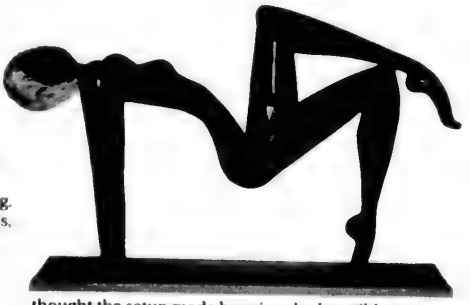
Every time she finished a piece, she would call the person on the top of the waitlist. They would come and see if they liked it, and if they didn't, she would call the next person on the list.

That's been her method of advertising ever since – word of mouth.

Lessem is a self-described dumpster diver. All of her materials for her sculptures are ones she finds and repurposes. Even the candles on Sofia, one of her only functional pieces, were ones someone had thrown away.

She called Katerina's Joy her most ambitious piece ever. It took her almost five months of work and a lot of perseverance to find a way to balance the figure on a sculpture horse. She said she wouldn't sell this piece, unless she found a collector who would treasure it as much as she does.

In fact, she sells all of her pieces only after vetting the potential buyer's home and helping them find a position that would enhance the home and the figure. Twice, she said, she turned away buyers because she thought the setup made her piece look terrible.



It can be a challenge finding buyers, she said, but still, she needs to make sure her art is cared for with as much love as she put into it.

For more information, contact Lessem at lee.lessem@gmail.com or 416-471-8448.

Entrepreneur's website is a resource for new moms

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Where does a new mom turn in the middle of the night when she has a parenting question to ask, or just wants to talk to other moms?

She turns to the digital Pink and Blue Magazine, which covers "a wide range of topics ranging from fashion, beauty, entertainment and the best parenting advice," founded by 33-year-old entrepreneur Nicole Bloomberg.

Bloomberg, who has dabbled in marketing, public relations, event planning and even jewelry design, started a Facebook forum for new mommies about two years ago when her daughter was five months old.

"The main purpose was to find support from other mothers, revolving around issues such as sleeping, breast feeding, daycare, etc.," said Bloomberg, a native of Hollywood, Fla., who moved to Toronto about seven years ago to be with her husband.

"A lot of pregnant and new moms also want to meet each other. The Facebook forum is an easy way to communicate, and it really took off," she said.

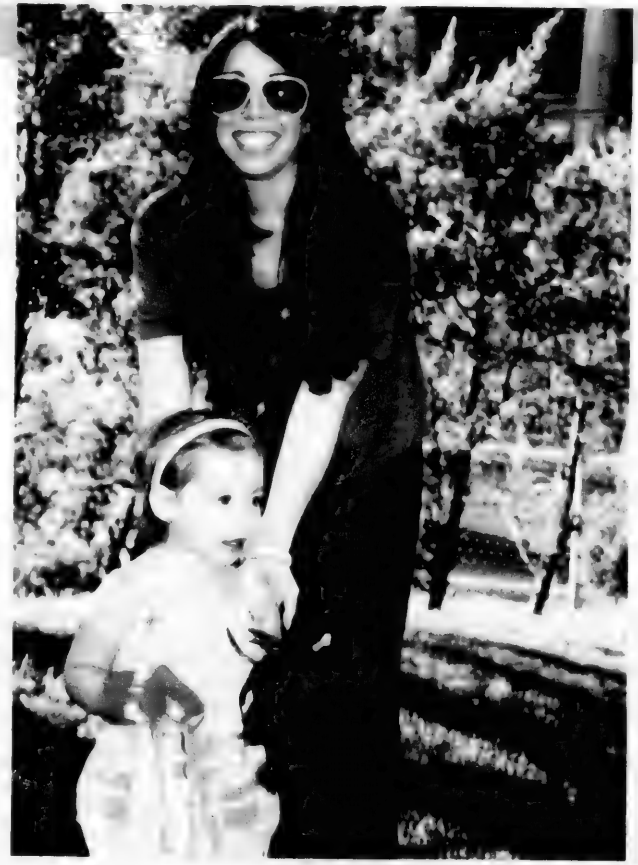
She did not anticipate such a huge response to the forum. To date, there are about 7,700 Pink and Blue members, with new members joining each week.

Utilizing her business acumen, Bloomberg turned her Facebook forum into a website.

"Every new parent needs the advice of experts, and I started [the website]... and enlisted these experts to write articles. I then took it to the next level," she said.

Bloomberg is now publisher and editor-in-chief of a free quarterly magazine, which published its first digital, interactive issue in the summer of 2012.

Bloomberg has about 52 experts on her roster including a pediatrician, a certified image consultant, a naturopathic doctor, a kid's nutritionist and a dentist.



Nicole Bloomberg and her daughter Iyla Sofie

"Every mom needs an expert [at their fingertips]," she said.

While the forum is made up mostly of new moms, the magazine is also geared toward kids and early teens.

Bloomberg said she has always had an interest in magazines, and when she was studying for her master's of business administration at Nova Southeastern University in Florida, she did a large project on a magazine.

"It has always been my dream to start a magazine, but [Pink and Blue] evolved naturally. It was never a definite plan," she said.

Before diving into the publishing world, Bloomberg was a jewelry designer who had created her own line. A portion of the proceeds from her handmade pieces went to charity.

"I've always wanted to do something I believe in. When I was in Florida, I created jewelry and gave some of the proceeds to Holocaust education," she said, adding that it was important to her to support a Jewish cause because her father is a Six Day War veteran, and her grandfather was an Israeli rabbi.

But now, much of her energy is focused on her two babies – her two-and-a-half-year-old daughter, and her magazine.

Bloomberg works long hours in her home office with the help of an assistant and an intern, and she employs writers, graphic artists and photographers.

"Sometimes I work from 9 a.m. until 11 p.m., but I have learned to balance my time. I am passionate about my work. I monitor the forum myself, and that alone is a full-time job. New moms trust the advice they get from experts and from other mothers," she said.

Bloomberg attributes the success of the magazine to its simplicity and accessibility.

"It is such a simple concept. Readers log in and upload our articles. Moms all over the world tell me that they have become addicted to it," she said.

"We're there for them day and night. They can come to one place, instead of searching all over the Internet for an answer to their questions."

Although she hasn't yet turned the magazine into a money-making venture, her work is about much more than selling advertising, she said.

"I'm building a community, and it's something I believe in. I feel like I'm giving back. I don't have a sales team yet, something I would love to have, but that would be taking it to the next level," she said.

"That's where the growth needs to happen. I'm not thinking about a print magazine – my market is online."

Film series continues for Toronto 'twins'

and Karen Mock
Special to The CJN

On Jan. 18, Temple Emanu-El and the Noor Cultural Centre, an Islamic educational and cultural organization, will continue their ongoing dialogue through the vehicle of film.

The first film in the Muslim/Jewish series was held in November during the annual Weekend of Twinning of synagogues and mosques, conceived by the Foundation for Ethnic Understanding (FFEU) in New York, N.Y., and co-ordinated in Canada by the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims (CAJM). Since it began in 2008, the twinning program has expanded worldwide to Jewish and Muslim communities who get together to build connections of understanding and friendship.

In November, members of Toronto's Jewish and Muslim communities gathered at Temple Emanu-El to watch Arranged, a beautiful tale of unlikely friendship based on a true story, in which Rochel – an Orthodox Jew – and Nasira – a conservative Muslim – meet as new teachers in a Brooklyn, N.Y., public school. Both are in the process of having their marriages arranged (or more accurately, of being introduced to potential partners by family and community members.) Their similar journeys to betrothal, and their shared experiences as religiously devout women in a secular environment, unite them.

This month, the Jewish/Muslim Film Series continues at the Noor Cultural Centre with an award-winning Lebanese movie, Where Do We Go Now? which received Ecumenical Special Mention and the Francois Chalais Prize at the Cannes Film Festival (2011), and the People's Choice Award at the Toronto International Film Festival (2011). This humorous and insightful film promises to stimulate a dynamic and fruitful discussion of how neighbours from different faith communities can diffuse tensions through various means when political strife threatens peace and friendship.

Samira Kanji and Azeezah Kanji are with Noor Cultural Centre (www.noorculturalcentre.ca). Barbara Landau and Karen Mock represent the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims (www.cajmcanada.org), founded in 1996. For more information on the film series and/or to participate in further activities of the CAJM, please check their website.

Exercise is good for brain and body

Senior Side of Life
Michael Gordon

We've all heard it before. There have been government programs promoting exercise. The Participaction program was originally launched by the federal government in the 1970s to promote healthy living and physical fitness, but was shut down due to cutbacks in 2001. It was revived in February 2007 with a grant from Ottawa. It's just one of many governmental efforts at all levels to promote healthy lifestyles among Canadians. The public and individual health impact of poor exercise habits appears increasingly to point to the need to do something to encourage and maintain healthy exercise practices among people of all ages.

Those of us who have "been around" know that the quest for, and acknowledgement of, the benefits of exercise for people of all ages is not new. I recall a wonderful program in Scotland, where I studied medicine, in which a group leader, standing on a centrally placed small stage and surrounded by literally hundreds of seniors, led a routine of dance and movement steps accompanied by very compelling Scottish country music themes. The musical themes and beat, as well as the "group" involvement, resulted in an outstandingly successful exercise program that was beneficial and great fun at the same time.

It's important for Canada's seniors to understand that exercise – whether walking, running, dancing, biking, swimming or cross-country skiing – is not just for the young, but for all of us throughout our lifetimes. Although the nature of the exercise might change, the importance of it in terms of long-term health benefits continues.

According to a number of recent medical journal reports, exercise and physical activity are important for older individuals as part of the recipe for remaining healthy and active. According to one study in the venerable Journal of the American Medical Association, "Limited mobility is a telltale sign of functional decline in aging patients. The key to healthy aging and independence, therefore, lies in retaining one's mobility." The U.S. study, authored by Cynthia Brown and Kellie Flood of the University of Alabama in Birmingham, "confirmed that increased physical activity and exercise are extremely important for healthy aging... A decline in mobility seems to quickly lead to an across-the-board decline, including the routine activities of daily living."

We know from other studies that heart and brain health and function are also enhanced by continuous physical activity.

According to one review of their research, "Brown and Flood recommend that physicians should ask their senior patients two questions: whether they have difficulty climbing up 10 steps or walking a quarter of a mile; and because of health or physical reasons, have they modified the way they do these two things. Any modification of a task such as climbing 10 steps raises a red flag... However, if identified early enough, appropriate corrective measures can be taken."

To complement this recent addition to our knowledge and understanding of the benefits of exercise and physical activity in older populations is a recent study from Denmark that shows moderate exercise is even greater motivation for a healthy lifestyle than more intensive exercise. This is important to understand for seniors, and people who promote and organize exercise programs for seniors, who often still believe that the goal should be the "maximization" of effort. Such inordinate exercise goals are often not tolerated by many elders, who, therefore, drop out of the programs or sometimes unfortunately sustain injuries from the excessive intensity of the exercise.

Add sparkle to your Tu b'Shvat seder

Mollie Katzen
JNS.org

Winter fruit might seem less spectacular than the much more valued offerings of summer, but oranges and pears in particular, while quiet and common, can be the unexpected stars of simple savoury dishes.

This is perfect for Tu b'Shvat, the Jewish New Year for trees, which is a relatively unsung holiday. Sparkle up your Tu b'Shvat seder with an easy but surprisingly delicious sweet potato-pear soup, which goes perfectly with a winter salad featuring crunchy, colourful leaves refreshingly coated with orange sections and a yogurty-orange vinaigrette, and exuberantly dotted with pistachios (also from trees). Finish the meal with an old-fashioned cake brimming with apples and walnuts, and studded with cranberries.

CRANAPPLE WALNUT CAKE

Originally printed in the Moosewood Cookbook, this recipe now appears, adapted slightly, in The Heart of the Plate. You will likely want to serve this à la mode with some vanilla ice cream. If you anticipate this need, be sure to have the ice cream on hand before you begin.

The cake is quite sweet as is. If you are going to serve it with the ice cream, you might want to reduce the sugar a notch or two – maybe to 1-1/2 cups. If you buy extra-fresh whole cranberries in season and freeze some, you can enjoy them year-round. No defrosting necessary. Use nonstick spray.

1 3/4 cups (packed) light brown sugar
1/2 cup grapeseed or canola oil
2 large eggs
1 tsp. vanilla extract
2 cups whole wheat pastry flour (also called "white whole wheat"), or you could use unbleached all-purpose flour
1 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. cinnamon
1/2 tsp. nutmeg
1/2 tsp. salt
2 medium apples (about 1/2 lb.), peeled and thinly sliced
1/2 cup chopped walnuts (chopped to the size of peanuts)
1/2 lb. fresh (or frozen) whole cranberries

Lightly spray a 9x13-in. pan with nonstick spray. Heat the oven to 375.

In a medium-large bowl, beat together the sugar, oil and vanilla. Add the eggs, one at a time, beating well after each.

In a second bowl, combine the flour with the other dry ingredients until thoroughly blended. Add the dry mixture to the wet, stirring until combined, folding in the fruit and nuts as you go. The batter will be very thick.

Patiently spread the batter into the prepared pan (take your time spreading it in place) and bake in the centre of the oven for 40-45 minutes, or until the cake pulls away from the sides of the pan, and the top surface is springy to the touch. Serves about 8.

Romaine and arugula join forces with radicchio and fresh orange sections, and an orange-laced yogurt dressing coats the leaves, allowing a scattering of pistachios to adhere at random. If you choose to form a bed of couscous or extra yogurt underneath each serving, you will be rewarded with an extra layer that both absorbs the delicious trickle-down juices and also boosts the volume of the dish, herding it into light main-dish terrain.

You can wash and spin the salad leaves (keeping them cold and very dry), prepare the vinaigrette and section the oranges well ahead of time. Dress and finish the salad immediately before serving.

The tangy vinaigrette, free-standing, will keep very well – for weeks – in a tightly covered container in the refrigerator. Shake well or stir from the bottom, before using.

Vinaigrette ingredients
1 heaping tbsp. finely minced shallot
1 tsp. agave nectar or honey
3 tbsp. orange juice
1 tbsp. cider vinegar
1/4 tsp. salt (rounded measure)
1/4 cup extra-virgin olive oil
1/4 cup plain yogurt (regular or Greek)
Salad ingredients
1/2 lb. very fresh radicchio (any type) handful of small arugula leaves about 6 perfect, crisp romaine leaves
2 oranges, sectioned
1/2 cup lightly toasted pistachios
Optional enhancement
Spread a bed of yogurt and/or couscous on the plate underneath the salad, as a bed to catch the dressing.

Vinaigrette:

Combine the shallot, agave or honey, orange juice, vinegar and salt in a small bowl, and whisk to thoroughly blend.

Keep whisking as you drizzle in the olive oil, keeping up the action until it is completely incorporated.

Stir/whisk in the yogurt and mix until uniform. Cover and refrigerate until use.

Salad Directions:

Have the cleaned, dried salad leaves in a large enough bowl. Break them into bite-sized pieces as desired. Add about 6 tbsp. of the vinaigrette, tossing as you go, to thoroughly coat all the leaves. Add the orange sections toward the end, mixing them in gently so they don't break. Sprinkle in the pistachios with the final toss, and serve pronto. Makes 4 servings.

SWEET POTATO-PEAR SOUP

Fresh pears and sweet potatoes are puréed together and finished off with touches of cinnamon and white wine. This unusual combination is slightly sweet, slightly tart and deeply soothing. My original version (published in Still Life with Menu) included milk or cream. This version is vegan-friendly, using oil instead of butter.

Use any wine that you enjoy drinking. And perhaps serve the rest of the bottle with the soup. Be sure to use the moist, orange variety of sweet potato, not the drier, starchier white type.

4 cups water
1 3-in. stick cinnamon
1 1/2 tsp. salt
3 large ripe pears (any kind but Bosc, which are too grainy)
1 tbsp. unsalted butter – or grapeseed or canola oil
1/4 cup crisp white wine
1 to 2 tbsp. fresh lemon or lime juice (to taste)
cayenne or white pepper (optional)

Peel sweet potatoes, and cut into small (about 3/4-in.) pieces. Place in a large saucepan with water, cinnamon stick and salt. Bring to a boil, cover and simmer until tender (about 10 minutes). Remove the cover and let it simmer an additional 5 minutes over medium heat. Remove and discard the cinnamon stick, and let the sweet potatoes rest in their cooking water while you fix the pears.

Peel and core the pears, and cut them into thin slices (about 1/4-in.).

Melt the butter (or heat the oil) in a heavy skillet over medium heat and swirl to coat the pan. Add the pears and cook, stirring often, for about 5 minutes or until quite soft. Add the wine, cover and simmer about 10 minutes longer over lowest possible heat.

Transfer the pear mixture to the sweet potatoes-au-jus, then purée everything together until smooth with an immersion blender. You can also use a stand blender in batches, and then return it to the pot.

Add lemon or lime juice to taste, plus a touch of cayenne or white pepper, if desired, and serve the soup hot. It reheats well, if necessary. Makes 5-6 servings.

'We want to go backwards'

Lev Tahor youngsters gather outside at the group's compound on the outskirts of Chatham in southwestern Ontario. The group has been dogged by allegations of child abuse, though its spokesmen say the children are loved and treated well.

CHATHAM, Ont. — About halfway through our interview, Uriel Goldman received a call on his cellphone. Family service workers from Chatham-Kent Child Services had appeared at his home for a surprise visit. His attendance was required.

Goldman left to meet the two investigators, returning 30 minutes later. The unscheduled visit was nothing new, he explained. In fact, it was the third such visit that day. Since the group of 250 members of Lev Tahor, an ultra-Orthodox sect seeking to live a "pure" Jewish lifestyle, relocated to Chatham-Kent from Quebec in November, the visits have become an almost daily occurrence.

The Lev Tahor, Hebrew for "pure heart," families are asked about their treatment of their children, their living conditions are investigated and, in at least one case, the child-care workers asked to see a mother change her baby's diaper and then checked the infant's body for bruises.

In addition, Chatham-Kent police have visited the community several times to reassure themselves and child protection officials that the children are appropriately cared for.

Special report: Lev Tahor

Nothing has ever been found, Goldman said, referring to the charges of child abuse or neglect that have dogged the group, first in Israel, then in Quebec and now in Ontario.

The complaints levelled by Quebec child protection authorities have included neglect, girls having fungus on their feet, physical abuse, giving children melatonin (an over-the-counter sleep aid) to calm them, and even a suggestion of mass suicide if they faced the prospect of losing their children.

Recently, an Ontario court held a hearing to determine whether the court had jurisdiction to uphold a Quebec court ruling to remove 14 children from three Lev Tahor families. On Nov. 27, 2013, a Quebec judge ordered the children be placed temporarily in foster care, undergo medical examinations and receive psychological support. But by then, community members with children had moved to Ontario.

Judge Stephen Fuerth of the Ontario court of justice will announce his decision on Feb. 3. Chris Knowles, the lawyer for Lev Tahor, suggested to reporters there might be an appeal against an adverse finding.

Lev Tahor members reject allegations of abuse or a suicide pact. Goldman and his colleagues, Mayer Rosner and Yakev Weingarten, laughed at the absurdity of the idea that the group would do themselves in. They say the allegation was based on the uninformed speculation of former Lev Tahor member Adam Brudzewsky, whose suggestion was repeated in court Nov. 27. His identity and testimony were only made public last week after a publication ban was lifted Jan. 16.

Complaint Dismissed

CALGARY — Calgary police dismissed a complaint from a pro-Israel group accusing an ex-student activist of hate speech. Ala'a Hamdan, former head of Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights at the University of Calgary, made posts to her Facebook page that she called "emotional and humanitarian reflections about the lives of Palestinians." One highlighted by Calgary United With Israel (CUWI) is written from the perspective of a mother speaking to a son. "Just know that if I'm alive the moment I loose [sic] you, I will cry rivers of tears but tears of happiness. I will soak a koffiah with your blood and save it to show your siblings," it said. "I will be named the mother of the martyr." CUWI called the posts hate speech that promote violence, but a police spokesperson told The CJN they "are protected as free speech, even if they are considered offensive to some."

Quebecer Deported

MONTREAL — A Quebec man was deported from Israel on Jan. 16 after being arrested by the Israeli army on charges of obstructing a military action and trying to assault a border police officer on the West Bank. Vincent Mainville, 26, a native of Gaspé, and Fabio Theodule of Italy, both members of the pro-Palestinian International Solidarity Movement (ISM), were arrested Jan. 8 in Khalil, near Hebron, and held in a Tel Aviv prison. Mainville is banned from Israel for 10 years. The ISM said the men were trying to stop soldiers from firing on and tear-gassing Palestinians who were throwing stones at them

Oren Joins CNN

WASHINGTON — Michael Oren, former Israeli ambassador to the United States, is joining CNN as a Mideast contributor. The U.S.-born historian was ambassador from 2009 until this past fall. He splits his time between Israel, where he lectures at the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya, and the United States, where he's a fellow at the Atlantic Council.

Leader Resigns

BERLIN — Stephan Kramer has resigned as secretary-general of the Central Council of Jews in Germany after serving for 15 years. In his appointed position, he helped with the development of an immigration law in 2005; with the re-orientation in 2008 of the work of federal commemoration sites for Nazi victims; and in 2012 with the German circumcision debate.

Filipina Caregiver Wins X-Factor Israel

Rose Fostanes

Rose Fostanes belted out the Frank Sinatra standard My Way accompanied by the Ra'anana Symphonette Orchestra to beat out three other finalists Jan. 14.

Fostanes has been working as a caregiver in Tel Aviv for the past six years and lives in a small apartment there with seven other Filipinos. She has been working abroad since she was 23 to send money to her family and partner. Prior to arriving in Israel, she worked in Egypt and Lebanon. She has not been home to see her family in two years.

Her sister, Nancy, told a newspaper in the Philippines that Rose was 15 years old when their father left the family, and Rose was left to raise her two sisters. Prior to the finals show, Fostanes was reunited with Nancy and longtime girlfriend Mel.

She thanked all her voters, especially in the Filipino community. Fostanes has said she hopes her appearance on the show would raise awareness of Israel's foreign workers, including about 20,000 Filipinos who mostly work long hours as caregivers for low pay.

Ex-envoy urges changes to Foreign Affairs website

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Friends of the State of Israel – as well as its foes – have long acknowledged that the Canadian government under Prime Minister Stephen Harper is one of the Jewish state's biggest supporters.

Then why, asks a group of Canadian lawyers and a former Israeli ambassador, does the website of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Affairs (DFAIT) not reflect that?

In a recent article in the Jerusalem Post, published shortly before Harper's visit, Alan Baker, a former Israeli ambassador to Canada, writes, "Despite the ostensible warm and supportive relationship evinced in the verbal statements by Canada's leaders, the DFAIT website reflects and echoes the standard and clichéd anti-Israel UN General Assembly resolutions, as well as the viewpoints of European countries regarding what they see as the rejection of any concept of Israeli control over the territories and the unlawfulness of Israel's settlements – subjects that are under active negotiation."

Alan Baker

Baker notes that Canadian lawyers associated with the Legal Forum for the Land of Israel presented Foreign Minister John Baird with a letter "suggesting that Canada amend its official website determinations regarding Israel and the territories and bring its official policy in line with the expressions of support for Israel and its positions so consistently voiced by Canadian leaders."

In outlining "Canadian Policy on Key Issues in the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict," the DFAIT website states, "Canada does not recognize permanent Israeli control over territories occupied in 1967 (the Golan Heights, the West Bank, east Jerusalem and the Gaza Strip). The Fourth Geneva Convention applies in the occupied territories and establishes Israel's obligations as an occupying power, in particular with respect to the humane treatment of the inhabitants of the occupied territories. As referred to in UN Security Council Resolutions 446 and 465, Israeli settlements in the occupied territories are a violation of the Fourth Geneva Convention. The settlements also constitute a serious obstacle to achieving a comprehensive, just and lasting peace."

Under the heading "The Barrier," referring to the West Bank security fence, the website states, "Canada recognizes Israel's right to protect its citizens from terrorist attacks, including through the restriction of access to its territory, and by building a barrier on its own territory for security purposes. However, Canada opposes Israel's construction of the barrier inside the West Bank and East Jerusalem which are occupied territories. This construction is contrary to international law under the Fourth Geneva Convention. Canada not only opposes Israel's construction of a barrier extending into the occupied territories, but also expropriations and the demolition of houses and economic infrastructure carried out for this purpose."

Two insightful pieces about a Jewish warrior

For someone who'd been in a coma for the last eight years, out of sight and virtually without mention, former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon attracted a massive amount of international media attention around the time of his death.

A proper summary of just the Canadian coverage isn't feasible in the brief space available here, other than to say that, with some exceptions, it was quite balanced and fair.

Let's focus instead on two very instructive pieces that appeared in print the same day, Jan. 14, one from Israeli author Yossi Klein Halevi in the Globe and Mail and the other from the National Post's Jonathan Kay.

Under the headline, "Sharon the builder, the destroyer," Klein Halevi focused on what he called the "paradoxical legacy" of Sharon's career filled as it was with mistakes, even failures, as well as triumphs.

The paradox refers to the fact that the man who, dismaying the left, was centrally responsible for the settlements, ended up as the one who, outraging the right, eventually destroyed all the settlements in Gaza (and four in the West Bank).

Many reporters and commentators referred to Sharon's 2005 unilateral withdrawal from Gaza as his way to create peace. Yet as Klein Halevi points out, in the preceding years of terrorism that plagued Israel (following Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's rejection of then-Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak's Camp David offer in 2000 of Palestinian statehood), Sharon was convinced that since Israel lacked a negotiating partner committed to peace, it had no choice but to take unilateral action.

Moreover – and this was Sharon's conversion from his previous pro-settlement position – he came to believe that Israel had to preserve itself as a Jewish and democratic state against what he saw as a demographic time bomb if it remained in control of millions of Palestinians.

As Klein Halevi observes: "Even as Mr. Sharon was consolidating a consensus around the war against terrorism, he was articulating a new political ground. He was the first Israeli politician to understand that the old left-right schism was being replaced by a centrist majority that agreed with the left about the need for a two-state solution and an end to occupation, but agreed with the right about the absence of a credible Palestinian partner for peace."

Unilateralism was a gamble that, according to some, opened space for the possibility of peace based on a two-state arrangement. Yet, at the same time, it allowed the rulers of Gaza – soon to be Hamas – more room to launch rockets into southern Israel instead of seizing the opportunity to act with pragmatic political responsibility. Many Israelis warned of the increased security dangers looming.

In his column "Ariel Sharon's masterstroke," Kay notes that "When Sharon ended the settler presence in Gaza ['Just 9,000 Israeli settlers – comprising about one-200th of Gaza's population'], his opponents predicted that the densely-populated, religiously devout territory would become a base for Islamist terrorists seeking Israel's destruction. And they were correct… But those costs must be set against the extraordinary, albeit intangible, benefits of the withdrawal."

Kay is blunt, arguing that "by evacuating Gaza, Sharon helped put the lie to [the idea that a responsible state would rise there]. Indeed, to this day, the hot mess called Gaza serves as Exhibit A to anyone who advocates an immediate, unconditional pullout from the West Bank that does not incorporate legitimate Israeli security needs."

Today, many western pundits expect that this is precisely how Israel should act, ignoring the fact that Israel is under no internationally binding obligation to do so. (In fact, international agreements call only for negotiations, not for Israeli unilateralism.)

Sharon's heroic struggle was to find a way forward that would preserve Israel's unique identity while ensuring its security. This remains the country's struggle and explains why Klein Halevi ends his piece by paying respect to Sharon this way: "Israelis across the spectrum mourn a man who devoted his life to defending Israel, and who had the courage to discard his own most cherished policies when those proved ineffective in keeping the Jews safe."

Paul Michaels is director of research and senior media relations for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

Stephen Harper gets it

As Prime Minister Stephen Harper returns to Canada from a tour of the Middle East, he brings with him an improved understanding of Israel and its conflict with the Palestinians, and confirmation that his principled stand with the Jewish state has been, and continues to be, the right thing to do.

In many ways, what Harper saw in Israel would have reminded him of home. Israelis and Canadians may speak in different tongues, but they share a common language of democracy, progress, opportunity and equality. Both peoples hold these values dear, and both countries have proven their willingness to fight to preserve them. (And after the epic snowstorm that hit the Middle East last month, Israelis now have a pretty good sense of what winter is like in this country, too.)

True, there is one significant way in which Canada and Israel are different – only the latter is hemmed in by enemies who threaten its very existence on a day-to-day basis – but Harper clearly grasps Israel's security concerns, and when he considers what the Jewish state has accomplished in 66 short years, all the while fighting for its life, he is suitably impressed.

The prime minister also spent some time meeting with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, but how could he possibly have related to what he saw and heard in Ramallah, where the forlorn Palestinian people continue to be ensnared by a culture of victimhood and violence despite myriad opportunities to join the modern world? Harper's visit to the West Bank came off as an inconvenient detour, and that was just as well: there isn't much good to see there, and no leader to talk about peace with – certainly not the weak-kneed Abbas, who spent the days before Harper arrived reaffirming he would not recognize Israel as a Jewish state and then applauding as one of his government's ministers called for renewed jihad against Israel.

Harper's first official Mideast trip highlighted the region's great potential, as well as the dark forces conspiring to quash it. A positive future, if there is ever to be one in that area of the world, relies on a peaceful solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. But in order for that to occur, Israel needs a willing partner, and one has not emerged yet.

The Canadian prime minister gets it – and that makes you stop and wonder why so many other world leaders don't. Too many of them continue to insist on calling the Israeli-Palestinian conflict straight down the middle, even as Israel does all the giving and the Palestinians all the taking – how do they not see that?

Another question: why don't the Palestinian people see it, either? How long will they allow themselves to be stifled by inept and corrupt leaders – not to mention Hamas – before they say enough is enough? A better life is within their collective grasp. They need only shove aside their overlords and reach for it.

When that day finally arrives, the Palestinians will truly begin their liberation, and the likes of Mahmoud Abbas will have much to answer for. Then we can really start to talk about peace.

Harper's Israel trip criticized

Twenty-one spiritual leaders of the Jewish community are accompanying Prime Minister Stephen Harper on his trip to the Middle East. Independent Jewish Voices Canada is discouraged to see Jewish communal leaders, in contradiction to Jewish ethical principles, lending their tacit support to a prime minister who has dismantled much of the Canadian social safety net, leaving Canada's most vulnerable citizens even further marginalized.

Accompanying the prime minister also trumpets support for the government of Benjamin Netanyahu which was elected by fewer than 24 per cent of Israeli voters. While the current government of Canada is uncritically supportive of Israeli policies, this stance does not reflect the opinions of all of Canada's Jews. We can only hope that the Jewish participants of this delegation will attempt to reflect the diversity of opinion among Canada's Jewish population and decline to be used as political pawns.

Gaza tarnishes Sharon legacy

The editorial about former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon ("Sharon's final lesson," The CJN, Jan. 16) is shockingly false and disingenuous.

How can you applaud and equate Sharon's "fighting spirit" with the 2005 war of expulsion he waged on the Israelis of Gush Katif, which, contrary to your view, did nothing to advance the cause of peace and did not "force peace," but in fact did the opposite, with all of Gaza becoming a new forward launch-pad to terrorist rocket attacks?

And how thoughtless is it to suggest that Israel survived the disengagement when 1,800 families were left without a viable plan for the rebuilding of their jobs, businesses and housing, most of whom suffered for years and some of whom still feel the effect?

Contrary to what you say were the lessons learned from Sharon's strength with his "bulldozer" approach, the lessons learned from the Gush Katif/Gaza expulsion are the exact opposite of what you claim – that we cannot again risk it all for no expectation of success.

Mandela was no friend to Israel

A recent editorial, ("Netanyahu's lame excuse, The CJN," Dec. 19) lambasted Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu for his no-show at the memorial service of Nelson Mandela in Johannesburg, South Africa. The writer maintains Mandela was a friend to Israel. The facts show otherwise.

On Oct. 20, 1999, nine years after his release from prison, Mandela travelled to Gaza and spoke before PLO leader Yasser Arafat and the Palestinian Legislative Council. To applause, Mandela said: "If the only alternative is violence, we will use violence!" Notice he used the word "we," associating himself with the Palestinians in their use of violence and terrorism against Israel.

Unfortunately, Mandela maintained a fondness for those who used violence to achieve their aims. In November 2004, when Arafat died, Mandela mourned his old friend saying that "Yasser Arafat was one of the outstanding freedom fighters of this generation." The editorial said that Mandela preached reconciliation for all of his post-presidential years. Is advocating violence part of this effort? When it came to the Jewish State of Israel, Mandela obviously had a change of heart.

Jewish learning is not affordable

Thank you Rabbi Jay Kelman, ("Pushing the door on tuition wide open," The CJN, Dec. 19) for your article on tuition fees.

As immigrant families in the 1970s, we made sure to send our children to Jewish schools. Now these children, although they are hard-working adults, cannot afford to send their own children to Jewish day schools. We can't afford to limit the study of the Torah to the part of the community who can afford it.

We as a community should come together to ask retired teachers to volunteer their time and ask our high school and yeshiva students to earn credits by volunteering two hours a week to teach children of middle-income families.

There have never been better times for the Jewish community than now, when we are free to study the Torah and practise our Jewishness. The only obstacle is that many young families cannot afford it.

Our community is rich enough to help Jewish day schools absorb more students. There is no value to money without Jewish education.

Crossing over: how is Dark Lullabies like Romeo and Juliet?

Irene Lilienheim Angelico

It was in the summer of 1983, the night before we were supposed to interview the granddaughter of the vice-commandant of Auschwitz, that I decided we could not proceed. In a moment of clarity, I realized I was betraying my parents, all the survivors of the Holocaust and all those who had died at her grandfather's command. What the heck did I think I was doing?

It had taken five years to get to this moment in Berlin. Much of the time was spent raising money for the documentary we were trying to make – Dark Lullabies, an examination of the effects of the Holocaust on the children of survivors and the next generation of Germans. The Jewish community was against the very idea – most of us would not even buy a Volkswagen, much less travel to Germany to speak with the children of perpetrators of the Holocaust.

Antje was in her 20s, a classic, blonde, blue-eyed German. She was as nervous about the interview as I was.

Until she was 13, Antje said, she always loved her doting grandfather. Then one day, a friend said to her, "Your grandfather – he was the vice-commandant of Auschwitz."

I asked her how she dealt with the crushing weight of this legacy. She said she began years of daily psychotherapy.

After the interview, my co-director/husband, Abbey Neidik, and I took Antje out for lunch, along with our crew. As we were finishing up, I decided to go to the post office, and Antje offered to walk me there and act as translator. No, thank you, I thought.

But she insisted.

The postman refused to mail my card because I had written all around the space where the stamp was supposed to go. "Tell him to sell me the stamp and I'll mail it myself," I told Antje.

The postman still refused, then instructed us to go to the stationery store, buy an envelope, put the card in, address it properly and come back. Then he would sell me a stamp.

Abbey and our crew of four were finishing lunch when they saw us returning – the daughter of concentration camp survivors and the granddaughter of the vice-commandant of Auschwitz, laughing together at the absurdity of the post office episode as we walked up the street.

Thirty years later, the Stratford Festival invited Abbey and me to show Dark Lullabies at the inaugural season of The Forum, a series of events the festival designed to connect the plays it performs to the issues of the day. The theme was "Communities divided and the role of the outsider."

I was to connect Dark Lullabies with Romeo and Juliet.

Romeo and Juliet is about the effect of an ancient conflict on two lovers from feuding families. When the teenagers dare to cross over the divide, they have to negotiate their loyalties to family and community with their newfound love for each other.

Shakespeare never tells us why the Montagues and the Capulets hate each other – the cause is not important. He is focused on what Romeo and Juliet must do now, and what the community has to do to end the feud.

When Romeo sneaks into the Capulets' party, he is crossing the great divide into the enemy camp. Like many an outsider, he builds the bridge that he and Juliet must cross. Their families are eventually willing to cross, too, but only after the tragic deaths of the young lovers.

Like Romeo, I crossed over against the will of most of my community and found myself right in the heart of the enemy camp. There were answers, or at least clues there, that I could not find on my side of the divide. For the next generation of Germans, especially the children and grandchildren of Nazis, the bridge was even more difficult to build.

But bridges must be built and crossed if wars are to end.

In many ways, Romeo and Juliet and Dark Lullabies are utterly different. The feud between the Montagues and the Capulets is between "two households, both alike in dignity" and equally alike in guilt. While there was dignity in the Jewish innocence and resistance during the Holocaust, there was virtually no dignity on the German side.

But Romeo and Juliet and Dark Lullabies are similar in that both emphasize the need to cross over. That's the only way to fully understand what needs to be known, and the only way, as Shakespeare so eloquently and powerfully dramatized, to live in love, dignity and peace for all.

I saw Antje again in 1986, three years after our first meeting. Dark Lullabies was being screened by special invitation at the Berlin Film Festival and I invited her to attend.

After the screening, we went out for ice cream.

Cloning just feels wrong

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

In my book club, we read some books with Jewish themes or authors, as well as others that have no Jewish connection, yet we always end up in discussions relating to community issues, religious tenets or our own lives.

The former category includes The Midwife of Venice, The Dovekeepers, and People of the Book.

The Midwife of Venice gave a glimpse into the way Jews lived in the Venetian ghetto. With Geraldine Brooks' People of the Book, we looked at my facsimile copy of the Sarajevo Hagaddah with fresh eyes, wondering how in its travels from Spain to Sarajevo it acquired its present characteristics.

We compared Alice Hoffman's fictional account of the Masada zealots with Yigal Yadin's account of excavations at Masada. Given Yadin's conclusions – if you read both books, check his theory about skeletons found near the palace with Hoffman's fictional reason – you see how she creates a different scenario.

But a real challenge looms with the book I will present this year – an example of one with no direct Jewish connection – Never Let Me Go, by Kazuo Ishiguro, on a timely and delicate subject: human cloning.

From a Jewish perspective, what are we to make of clones being created and used for spare parts by their "models?"

I never thought that cloning humans, even for infertile couples, could be halachically permitted, or ethically, either, for that matter. My thought – even before reading the book – was that cloning an individual is monstrous. We're all unique: even identical twins, with identical DNA, grow up as different people. There is so much more to us than our DNA: the sum of all our experiences and the way we filter those experiences through perspectives created over a lifetime. So when I went to Rabbi Google for a Jewish perspective, I was shocked.

Rabbi Moshe Tendler, in a 1997 New York Times letter to the editor, wrote that in the instance of a Holocaust survivor (for an example) who had no family left, it could be permissible for that person to be cloned so as ensure continuation of a family line. He saw no halachic problem with this, at least in his short letter.

Rabbi Michael J. Broyde agrees (Cloning People and Jewish Law: A Preliminary Analysis). He argues: "I am essentially unaware… of any substantive violation of Jewish law that… occurs when one clones cells from one human being into the egg of another and implants that fertilized egg into a gestational mother… [W]here the clonor is a man such that he fulfils the obligation to be fruitful and multiply… and he cannot fulfil the obligation otherwise… cloning can be classified as a good deed (mitzvah kiyumi); in those circumstance where the clonor is a woman, cloning can be classified as… neither prohibited nor a mitzvah, simply permissible."

But wait! What about creating clones for spare parts? Or having a second child as a bone marrow or kidney donor for a first child? This rabbi sees no difficulty in the latter, and leaves the former for "ethical" considerations apart from Halachah, quoting the Maharal, who wrote that people were put into this world to participate in creation, to "bring to fruition things that are not found in nature." Cloning, Rabbi Broyde concludes, "is but one example of that conquest, which when used to advance humanity, is without theological problem in the Jewish tradition."

I was uncomfortable with this, to say the least. So, onward to Eitan Fiorin's article "The Case Against Cloning" (Torah u-Madda Journal, 2000).

He argues that in ethical terms, "there are technological heights to which humanity ought not ascend, and I would include human cloning among these." I guess that would translate as "just because you can do it, doesn't mean you should."

The strict halachic view may say yea, but should we not include an ethical imperative in our considerations? Can you say The Boys From Brazil?

There are already signs that a rosy picture of continual human technological advancement is stuttering: what about militaries investigating the possibility of a cloned army, in order to save lives – human lives, that is. And the replacement child? How would you feel about being one?

We have the right to save a life, and we possess the ability to create things not found in nature.

But cloning? It just feels wrong. Let's see what my book club thinks.

What does it mean to be 'religious'

Norma Raumel Joseph in Montreal

What does it mean when someone says, "I'm not so religious"?

People often say that to me, and I find it baffling. These people seem like good, moral people. They're active in their synagogues or work for the Jewish community.

What image of religion do they have? What are their standards, and to whom are they comparing themselves?

Often they are deeply "spiritual." But what does that word tell me other than that people have an aversion to the word religion?

Why?

Scholars of religion spend an inordinate amount of paper and time defining the word and concept of religion. They argue about many nuances and shades of meanings. Most agree that human beings practise religion communally and that it is a social institution. It's not a purely individual activity, although individuals vary in their attachment and personal share or stake in it. Individuals also carve divergent connotations and even practices into, or from, shared patterns. Importantly, all religions combine narratives, stories in texts and oral versions that are held to be true and/or sacred with practices, rituals that shape the annual and life cycle of the community. Religions contain a people's cultural heritage.

Given this view of the category, you can understand my confusion, and even dismay, when people say to me, "I'm not so religious." Do they disown their own Jewish heritage? Are they giving it up to those they think practise it better? Hidden in this seemingly innocuous phrase is the possibility that some are letting others own, and, therefore, control, not only a religious doctrine or practice, but their entire heritage.

So let me parse this out.

There are many ways of being religious. Keeping the Sabbath is, of course, a prime example. So is helping the widow and the orphan. Those who work for the community are religious. Those who act in such a way as the name of God is praised in the world, performing kiddush HaShem, are religious. Those who defile the name of God (chillul HaShem) are not being or acting religious. On an important level, there are many who act with civility in the larger world, leading people (non-Jews) to say, "What a goodly people they are." That brings about kiddush HaShem.

There are also some Jews who may appear to keep many rituals, but act in the world in a way that brings about disgrace to Jews and God, and that can't be considered religious. So we need to be more careful with our terms and understanding.

I know that quite often, it's humility that causes people to say, "I'm not so religious." People see others whose piety is astounding. There are people who walk and talk with Jewish awareness and guidelines all the time. Their ways are holy, and their religiosity is awesome. But there are many ways to be religious, not all of which are visible on the outside.

Some people afraid to use the word religious say they're spiritual. Why lose the category of religion. It's our heritage. I don't want to let you give it up, or give it away to one sect of Jews, the visible ones. Just because someone dresses a certain way doesn't mean they're the only ones who are religious. Sixteenth-century Polish clothing does not a Jew make.

Comparing one Jew to the other is not helpful in this labelling game. There's no rule that only a few can be religious, or that it's a title belonging to only those who don't drive on the Sabbath. If someone doesn't drive on Shabbat, but steals or beats his wife, is he religious? I think not. So be careful with giving away both the title and our heritage. And most vitally, don't relinquish control over that heritage because someone looks a certain way or sounds a certain way.

Yes, I would wish that all Jews were religious, fully believing and practising, with all levels of our heritage engaged. But we're not living in messianic times, so I'll continue to use the word religious judiciously, since many in our community are truly religious, and they offer me confidence in the future.

Leading Weizmann researcher speaks in Toronto

Scientist's discovery advances stem-cell research

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Thanks to a major breakthrough by one of the Weizmann Institute of Science's most promising researchers, clinical trials based on stem cell research – which could lead to technologies that can repair damaged tissue, treat autoimmune diseases and even grow transplant organs – could be underway within the next 10 years.

Dr. Jacob Hanna was in Toronto last week as the guest of honour at a Weizmann Canada event held at the Beer Academy called "Revealing a Piece of the Stem Cell Puzzle," where he shared the latest news about his team's discovery of a protein that makes the process of converting adult stem cells to embryonic stem cells dramatically more efficient and stable.

In an interview with The CJN, Hanna explained that his research builds on the work of Shinya Yamanaka, a Japanese stem-cell researcher who won the Nobel Prize for medicine in 2012 for his discovery that adult cells can be converted to stem cells.

"He was able to show that we can take a skin cell and by putting in four genes that are normally expressed in the early embryo, we can reprogram, convert the cell all the way back to the start… to what we call the embryonic stem cell state," said Hanna, a 34-year-old Arab-Israeli from the Galilee who has been working at the Weizmann Institute as an independent scientist since 2011.

Dr. Jacob Hanna, a Weizmann Institute scientist, was in Toronto last week to talk about his groundbreaking research on stem cell technology. [Gil Tamin photo]

Embryonic stem cells are crucially important, because they have yet to be programmed to become a specific type of cell.

Hanna said that while the current process of producing induced pluripotent stem (iPS) cells solves a lot of ethical issues, because the process doesn't require using an egg or fetal material, it's very inefficient – it can take up to four weeks to produce an iPS cell and the success rate is about 0.1 per cent. Scientists have also found that it's very difficult to keep iPS cells in their unprimed state.

Because the process is so slow and inefficient, Hanna and his team realized that resetting the cells to their embryonic state wasn't enough.

In the Sept. 18 issue of Nature, Hanna outlined an important breakthrough discovered by his team to address those issues.

"We identified a protein called MBD3. This protein acts like a brake in a car," said Hanna, who has won numerous awards and was named one of the top 35 young innovators in 2010 by Technology Review magazine.

Hanna and his team discovered that removing the protein from the adult cells dramatically sped up the process and improved efficiency.

"When we dismantle this brake, we can get up from 0.1 per cent to 100 per cent… in six days," he said.

"This brings us closer to a vision of a patient who shows up and we need to quickly make cells and they quickly need to be high quality and then we can use them. So, I really think this is a step forward in an important direction," he said.

"As the population is aging more and people live longer, and we have new diseases, and people want to have a higher quality of life, there is a great need for tissue replacement. The idea is, how do we come up with a reproducible, accessible source of tissues for replacement that will also not be rejected [by the body] – basically, genetically identical to the patient?"

By reprogramming mature, adult stem cells to create iPS cells, which would be grown in the lab to be differentiated into many different cell types, these iPS cells can be used to treat autoimmune diseases such as multiple sclerosis and could potentially grow transplant organs.

Because the process requires the use of a patient's own mature cells, it would drastically reduce the chances of the body rejecting a transplant.

When asked how long it could take for the general public to be able to benefit from this technology, he laughed, saying, "I'm not a prophet. But considering the rapid pace of this field, within the next five to 10 years, we could start seeing valid and serious clinical trials based on these technologies."

Another important element of Hanna's research, which was also featured in his recently published paper, is working to understand why mouse embryonic stem cells are easier to preserve in their unprimed state than human ones.

"We are for the first time, able to make mice, animals that are chimeric [composed of two or more kinds of genetically distinct cells]… with human tissue," he explained.

"You now can have a mouse who has low levels of human liver or human blood cells in that mouse, and I think that is very exciting because it gives us a platform perhaps to look at human tissue formation in a living organism. I think that is one of the next frontiers for our field."

Family creates scholarship to memorialize son

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Shortly after Matthew Ginsburg passed away in 2012 at age 28, his parents headed to the University of Ottawa to accept an award in child and adolescent psychiatry on his behalf.

Ginsburg, who is originally from Grimsby, Ont., was doing his psychiatry residency at the Royal Ottawa Hospital when he died five months after he was diagnosed with cholangiocarcinoma, or bile duct cancer.

He was set to receive the award while he was still alive, but unfortunately he passed away before the ceremony. When his parents arrived to accept it, they found out just how well respected their son was by his peers.

"Everyone was there, everyone who had anything to do with Matthew, even if they dealt with him for an hour," his mother, Karen Ginsburg, said.

That's when she and her husband decided they wanted to make sure he left his mark on the school.

"We thought this was a place we'd like to leave his legacy," she said.

Working with the psychiatry department, the family has set up a scholarship in his honour. They hope to raise enough money to set up an endowment fund so that Matthew's memory will live on for years to come as new students apply for the award, which will likely be worth from $800 to $1,000 and go to students who most embody his spirit.

"Everything that Matthew was… His honesty, integrity, loyalty, kindness, empathy," his mother said, adding that he was also a very positive person, even in the face of illness. "He never let it get in his way."

In order to endow the award, the family needs to raise $25,000, which would be invested through the Royal Ottawa Foundation for Mental Health. Each year, students would submit applications to the university, which would then select finalists. From that group, the family – including his parents, grandparents and three brothers, as well as a wife and daughter – would pick the winner.

Karen Ginsburg said her son's illness was extremely hard to deal with. He was diagnosed with a form of ulcerative colitis when he was nine years old, and in 2012, he was found to have cancer of the bile duct, a rare complication of ulcerative colitis.

She said it's normally a slow disease, but in her son's case, "it went so quickly, there was no time to catch your breath."

His daughter, two months old at the time of his death, was even delivered early so she would have the chance to meet her father.

"He's missed more than anything. It's hard to go on," his mother said. "This is the only way we could honour him."

Archives gets audiotapes of 1970s leaders

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

An irreplaceable collection of more than 100 audiotapes of notable figures in the Toronto Jewish community, many no longer alive, was recently donated to the Ontario Jewish Archives (OJA).

Sam Hoffer, president of Second Encounter, a group that presented seminars on a variety of topics in the mid-1970s, said the tapes include such personalities as Joseph B. Salsberg, Prof. Emil Fackenheim, Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut, Basya Hunter, Ben Kayfetz, Rabbi Stuart Rosenberg, Vivian Rakoff and many more.

"I am delighted to have donated the tapes to the Jewish Archives," Hoffer said. "They can now not only be properly preserved, but also hopefully digitized and made available to future generations."

The former Toronto Jewish Congress (TJC) and the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE) jointly sponsored Second Encounter, along with the TJC's Holocaust Remembrance Committee.

"We are absolutely thrilled to add the Second Encounter collection to the Ontario Jewish Archives," said OJA director Dara Solomon.

"The audio recordings of this speaker series, which includes the most important community leaders, scholars and thinkers of the era, will be an invaluable resource to the OJA's community of researchers.

"Through this series, we have the opportunity to explore further the issues of the post-Holocaust period. We look forward to processing this material and making it accessible to our community."

In 1976, Hoffer was studying at OISE and decided to put his learning to work.

Sam Hoffer

He and a group of friends launched Second Encounter as an educational program for the community.

He said the Second Encounter group wanted to do something meaningful to engage young adults. The name was derived from the belief that the Holocaust was so cataclysmic that each generation would have to confront the reality of what had occurred.

The initial program focused on the Holocaust. Over time, seminar themes expanded to include a broad range of subjects.

Second Encounter presented eight events over four years. Some of the seminar topics were "Holocaust," "Exploring Canadian-Jewish Experience," "An Encounter with Israel," "Perspectives on Anti-Semitism," "Judaism, Religion and Identity" and "Survival of a People."

The concept immediately struck a chord in the community, starting with the very first event, and the programs attracted hundreds of people, young and old, from across Toronto and beyond, Hoffer said.

After four years, OISE decided to charge for the use of its facilities, which, along with other financial constraints, led to the program being discontinued.

Speaking of the OJA, Hoffer said he was delighted "that such an institution exists in our community, one that can preserve and more importantly make accessible to future generations, our invaluable treasured voices.

"The recordings of these remarkable keynote speakers and seminar leaders of the community will hopefully be a worthy legacy and a lasting contribution to our community," he added.

Kids' basketball tourney raises funds for charity

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

Hallie Rodney, now 13, has played basketball since she was six. When she began to learn the sport with the Steve Nash Youth Basketball Program, Hallie was the only girl on the team. She took this in stride and now aspires to represent Canada at the Maccabiah Games in Israel in a few years.

Hallie Rodney on the basketball court

But at the moment, despite her busy school life, playing competitive basketball and practising to reach those dreams, she also has room for charity. The Thornhill, Ont., teen is the brainchild behind Hoops Kids, a basketball tournament for students from grades 3 through 8 that raises money for Jewish causes.

The youth tournament, heading into its third year, began as Hallie's bat mitzvah project. Hallie and her mother, Julie, looked online for a charity that merged two of her loves: basketball and Judaism. They found the Toronto-based Hoops (previously Hoops 4 Israel) for adults, and it was Hallie's idea to make a sub-tournament for kids only.

"For charity, people will obviously donate. But if people actually get to participate in charity, I feel like it will be more engaging toward them," Hallie told The CJN.

Hoops and Hoops Kids used to send donations to at-risk Ethiopian Jews in Bat Yam, Israel, but the fundraising focus shifted this year to local Jews who need financial help.

Through UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, funds are going to Jewish Family & Child to help limit the effects of poverty on more than 20,000 Jewish men, women and children. The funds will cover basic needs like food, clothing, housing and transportation, as well as items like beds and dental care.

Hallie's road to becoming involved in the community began when she was in Grade 6 and she represented her school at We Day, organized by the charity Free the Children. The daylong event focuses on charitable causes in the local, national and international community and helps young people learn to effect change.

"[We Day] really made me think about how people around the world aren't as privileged as me," she says. "I was thinking, maybe I can do something that will help a global cause."

Hallie's good example has since inspired her younger brother, 11-year-old Mitchell, to do some of his own charity work. He went around his neighbourhood asking for cozy winter clothes for his own personal cause, Warm Up with Mitchell. Mitchell brought the clothes he collected to Temple Har Zion, for the Out of the Cold program.

The idea to give back to the community was self-motivated, said their father, Jordan, who runs an human resources consulting business with his wife. "Our philosophy is that leaders are not born," he said. "You have to work hard to be a leader. It's about equipping Hallie with the tools to demonstrate leadership skills at a young age to hopefully carry her through her life."

Julie has similar praise for her daughter's initiative and hopes that other kids learn by Hallie's example. "It's really important for parents to make sure that their kids get involved in charity," Julie said. "You have to make it a priority."

Organizing Hoops Kids is very much a family affair. Julie helps to market the event and spread awareness. Hallie's grandfather, who was a gym teacher for 40 years, helps with operations. Her grandparents also fundraise before the event and on the day of Hoops Kids. Meanwhile, close friends of the family show up to be referees and timekeepers.

"[My parents] give us a lot of tips and ideas on what we can do," Hallie said. "They help me organize it a lot. I don't think I would really be able to do it by myself. They're always there carrying all the boxes and everything, and I really look up to them because they support me a lot."

Unlike the three-on-three tournament for adults, Hoops Kids is a round-robin competition. Since its inception in 2011, the fundraiser has raised nearly $7,000, but has also been on a different date than the adult event.

This year, Hoops Kids will be same day as Hoops – Sunday, Feb. 23. The event begins at 5 p.m. at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel Family Education Centre in Vaughan, Ont., after the adult tournament finishes. The Rodneys said they hope this scheduling will bring in more money and participants.

Young volunteers can also start their own fundraising page this year, which could help spur bigger donations. In the past, kids only had to pay a small entrance fee. To participate, youths can now register at https://hoopstoronto.com/kids.

Although Hallie is the leader of this initiative, she may pass it forward to her younger siblings, Mitchell and seven-year-old Layla, in the future. "I want to make this an annual thing," Hallie said. "When I get too old, I will still organize it, but I won't participate."

Israeli scholar to discuss 'untold story' of Jewish explusion

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

About two years ago, Hebrew University professor Shmuel Moreh wrote a book for an Arab-speaking audience that appeared online. It was titled The Jews of Iraq, Concerns and Hopes, and it looked at the contribution made by the country's Jews to Iraqi society in the 1930s and '40s, when Moreh was growing up there.

The book spawned plenty of comments and responses from readers, and Mordechai Kedar, a scholar of Middle Eastern cultures at Bar-Ilan University, made a point of reading them all.

What he saw wasn't pretty.

They could be broken down into two categories, he said.

"One group was saying, 'Look at those Zionist Jews. They went to Palestine, kicked out the Palestinians and now they have a vicious, racist state. That exposes the real face of those Jews who lived with us for thousands of years. Good thing we kicked them out, and inshallah we'll go up to Palestine and kill them all.'"

The other group lamented the loss of the Jews, seeing them as important to the fabric of the nation. They say, "We didn't treat them nicely. They went to their homeland and we're left with jihadists who kill us day and night. We wish they would return to bring some normalcy to our lives," said Kedar.

Of course, Jews are in no hurry to return to the Arab world, though at one point, almost one million made their homes there. But beginning in the late 1940s, country after country, from Morocco to Iraq, made life intolerable for Jews, leading to a mass exodus. Only a few thousand remain.

Kedar will speak on the untold story of the expulsion of the Jews at Congregation Darchei Noam on Saturday, Jan. 25, at 7:30 p.m. His lecture is Part 2 of a five-part series presented by the synagogue on "The Jewish Exodus from Arab Lands."

The expulsion of nearly one million Jews is linked directly to the creation of the State of Israel in 1948 and is attributable to a cultural flaw prevalent in the region, Kedar said in a telephone interview from Israel.

"There is a basic problem in the Middle East about 'the other,' the 'big O,' whomever it is," he said. "It could be from another tribe, ethnic group, religion or sect."

Unlike individualistic western societies that have integrated people from all around the world, "the group is the basic unit of [Arab] society," he said.

Since the Middle East is largely arid, water resources are scarce "and if you don't fight, you're a dead man, because another tribe will come and take your spring or well. This culture is engraved with that, and in the culture of the region, the other is always the enemy," he said.

Mordechai Kedar

"Jews have lived in these societies as a small group, so they were not viewed as a threat. But once they had a state, they were viewed as people with power, and this is when they became dangerous in the eyes of the Middle East."

That meshes with "the Islamic view that Jews have no right to a state, to be independent… That is why they cannot and will not recognize Israel as a Jewish state," he added.

Kedar, who served for 25 years in Israeli military intelligence, pointed out that Haj Amin al-Husseini, the leader of the Palestinian national movement in the 1940s, "was actually a friend of Adolf Hitler who went to the Balkans to recruit Muslims from Bosnia to serve as soldiers to guard bridges of trains that took Hungarian Jews to Auschwitz. Husseini was part of the German Nazi extermination machine."

Palestinian nationalists "sent messages across the Arab and Islamic world to incite them against Zionists, to collect money and to buy weapons and to bring in fighters," he added.

The result was the forced exodus of nearly one million Jews. Though the vast majority were settled in Israel, their story remained largely untold, as the Palestinian narrative grabbed the public's attention. The fact is that more Jews left their homes and they left behind vastly more property than the Palestinians, Kedar said.

In recent years, however, advocacy organizations have publicized the Jews' plight, with the U.S. Congress taking up their cause. Late last year, the foreign affairs committee of the House of Commons issued a report, Recognizing Jewish Refugees From the Middle East and North Africa, that in part called on the federal government to raise the issue of Jewish refugees when Middle East refugees are discussed in international forums.

For its part, Israel largely ignored the issue for years.

"We Israelis did not make an issue of it, because to a large extent we took the line that we are building a new life in Israel, the life of a free people and we turned our back on the miserable history which we had. Even the Holocaust… We tried to shape a new mentality of a Jew who is detached from the misery of exile. This is why we didn't make the miseries into a public discourse," said Kedar.

LEARNING ABOUT ISRAEL: Shinshinim, young emissaries from Israel, Saar Ben Zion and Shir Keren, share their experiences of Tu b'Shvat in Israel with students in senior kindergarten at Bialik Hebrew Day School. Through games on the map, the children learn how the funds collected through the Jewish National Fund's blue box are used to support the environment by planting trees, constructing bike trails and having parks for family picnics, among other activities.

A new chapter in Canadian Jewish activism

Opinion

David Koschitzky

Prime Minister Stephen Harper's trip to Israel this week is a milestone for Canada's Jewish community. The fact that Harper is only the fourth Canadian prime minister to visit Israel while in office is, as many commentators have rightly noted, a visible demonstration of his strong personal support – and that of his caucus – for the Jewish state. Indeed, after years of consistently expressing empathy for Israel at times when many western states failed to do so, the prime minister's delegation has been met with the warmth that signifies a reunion of old friends rather than diplomats.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs was honoured to be part of this historic delegation, which included diverse representation from across Canada's Jewish community. From the perspective of Canadian Jewry, this trip is more than validation of a strong relationship, it's an opportunity to open a new chapter in Canadian Jewish activism.

Unprecedented Canadian goodwill toward Israel comes at a time of extraordinary change and uncertainty in the Jewish world, even setting aside the myriad security threats confronting Israel post-Arab Spring and pre-Iranian nuclear weapons capacity. The Jewish state faces shifting diplomatic challenges while the Jewish People struggle to transmit Jewish (and Zionist) identity to the next generation. In many ways, what appear to be distinct problems – anti-Israel campaigns and challenges to Jewish continuity – are rooted in a single imperative: to foster activism among Diaspora Jewry in innovative, compelling ways.

Just as there is no single way in which to express one's Jewish identity, we must recognize that Jewish and pro-Israel activism is most dynamic when it reflects the aspirations and inspiration of the individual.

For some, Israel advocacy is a matter of engaging elected representatives, organizing events, sending emails and – increasingly – spreading the good word on Facebook and Twitter. As important as these tactics are, the next phase in Canadian Jewish activism should be to expand the Canada-Israel relationship into unconventional areas. With political support at an all-time high, we would be remiss to ignore the opportunity to build ties with Israel across Canadian society – including in business, academia and civil society. This is one of the keys to ensuring that the Canada-Israel relationship weathers the uncertainties of future governments and the shifting tactics of anti-Israel activists.

While we should continue to mobilize young Jews to become active in conventional Jewish advocacy, we must recognize that many will never march in the streets as their parents once did for Soviet Jewry. But they can be – and many already are – inspired by Israel's environmental breakthroughs, reputation as the "startup nation," progressive approach to LGBT rights and grassroots passion for social justice (as seen in the peaceful socioeconomic "tent protests" in 2011).

This energy should be harnessed for the benefit of Jewish identity and advocacy alike by encouraging the next generation of Jewish Canadians to bring Jewish values and Israeli solutions into those areas of Canadian civil society that most inspire them. Fostering their desire to engage with Israel on their own terms will not only strengthen their love of Israel and Judaism, but also put them at the forefront of broadening Canadian support for the Jewish state.

Bill 60 public hearings underway in Quebec

Charter threatens ability to recruit staff: hospital

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Jewish General Hospital (JGH) says its ability to recruit and retain staff, especially doctors, nurses and researchers, will be in jeopardy if the bill banning religious symbols in Quebec's public sector becomes law.

The Montreal hospital was one of three Jewish organizations that weighed in last week on the province's proposed secularism charter last week as public hearings on Bill 60 opened at the National Assembly Jan. 14.

In addition to staffing issues, the JGH is also concerned that it may not be able to serve kosher food exclusively.

In its brief, the Lord Reading Law Society, an association of Jewish lawyers, said the charter is unconstitutional and should be withdrawn. It also said it hopes to be invited to make an oral presentation to the committee, which is slated to hear from 250 groups before proceedings wrap up at the end of March.

The JGH, however, has chosen not to appear. "The hospital has submitted a concise brief on Bill 60 which it feels stands on its own," spokesperson Astrid Morin said.

Meanwhile, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) criticized Democratic Institutions Minister Bernard Drainville, who is spearheading the charter, for his "intransigent" position and his "undermining" of the public consultation process. Drainville's statement on the opening day of hearings that the government won't make changes to the bill is "a cynical manipulation of Quebec's democratic institutions and a waste of public funds for partisan ends," said CIJA Quebec vice-president Luciano Del Negro.

Bernard Drainville [Wikimedia Commons]

The JGH said in its brief that the charter's effect on hiring would be very serious, since it recruits many of its health-care workers from elsewhere in Canada and the world. It also fears existing employees may consider leaving Quebec.

One longtime staff member has already made up his mind. The brief quotes physician Ronald Schondorf, an observant Jew who wears a kippah at all times, as saying: "If the charter is adopted in its present form and is enforced, I will leave the province, never to return.

"By doing so, I realize I am depriving many Quebecers of my expertise. There are, however, lines that cannot be crossed, and I will not tolerate an era where individual groups are blithely deprived of liberties."

The JGH reiterated that it would neither abide by the charter's ban on staff wearing overt religious symbols nor apply for any exemption for health-care institutions provided for in the proposed law, whether short-term or indefinite.

Such a prohibition is "profoundly discriminatory and deeply insulting," the hospital said, which has a highly diverse workforce of more than 5,200.

Rather, the JGH said it would join with other institutions in launching a legal challenge to the bill.

The hospital rejected Drainville's suggestion, made before the bill was tabled in November, that because of its distinct history and characteristics, the JGH might be permitted a longer transition time to implement the charter or be able to apply for, effectively, an unlimited number of exemptions.

"Neither of these options is acceptable to the JGH. The JGH would not seek a more gradual or convenient way of easing into legislation with whose principles the hospital fundamentally disagrees," it said.

"The position of the board of directors is that since the bill is inherently prejudicial and contrary to the JGH's values, there is no point in taking advantage of any article that would grant temporary, short-term relief."

The JGH board believes it should retain the power to handle any request for accommodation by staff or patients, although it says it has not received a single complaint from the public about an employee's religious attire. Moreover, it noted, the exemption offered only applies to employees' apparel, not the institution's obligation to be religiously neutral.

The brief also said the charter could prevent the JGH from serving only kosher food to patients and in its main cafeteria, as it has throughout its history.

The proposed charter's entrenchment of gender equality may also mean religious patients would "lose the privilege of having a same-sex doctor, nurse or other health-care professional assigned to their care, where possible," as is the JGH's practice.

Lord Reading said the proposed law represents a reversal of the full political rights granted to Jews and other religious minorities more than 180 years ago. It was referring to the Lower Canada legislature's 1832 passage of a law giving Jews the same political rights as Christians.

'Café' puts death on the agenda

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Congregation Shaarey Zedek played host to the city's first Death Café earlier this month.

While new to Winnipeg, the Death Café concept is widespread throughout Europe and the United States, says Rena Boroditsky, executive director of Chesed Shel Emes, Winnipeg's non-profit Jewish funeral chapel. The program's format allows people to come together to talk about death and dying in an informal social setting.

"We had a very positive response to the evening," she said. "We thought maybe 15 people might show up. We had 60 people participate."

"In our society, people don't often have the opportunity to talk about death and dying," said Brenda Borzykowsky, who chaired the organizing committee for the evening.

Borzykowsky first learned about the concept last spring when she saw a story about it in a Toronto newspaper – both of her sons live in Toronto with their families. She subsequently watched a feature on the subject on 60 Minutes. Mount Pleasant Cemetery in Toronto holds regular Death Cafes in its boardroom for groups of about 12 to 15 people, she noted.

"I thought it would be a wonderful thing to bring the Death Café concept to Winnipeg," she said.

In November, Borzykowsky contacted Boroditsky about having the program here, and was asked to go ahead. She enlisted a small group of people, several with health-care backgrounds, to serve on an organizing committee.

The format for the initial Death Café here had participants sitting around tables, eight to a table including a facilitator/organizer, talking about their views of death and dying and the world to come.

"I started the conversation for my group by asking what brought them to the café," Borzykowsky said.

Among the subjects that came up, she noted, were the difficulty of talking about death and preparing for death with family members, spiritual beliefs and becoming incapacitated.

"By talking about my own death, I am becoming more comfortable with it," she said.

Winnipeg's Death Café may have been the first in Canada to be hosted by a Jewish community, Borzykowsky said, although the program was not intended only for Jews.

"The feedback was fantastic," she added. "People appreciated being able to speak freely in a non-threatening environment.

"A lot of people were asking when we can do this again. Our committee is thinking we will have a second Death Café some time in the spring."

Ontario provided best educational opportunity

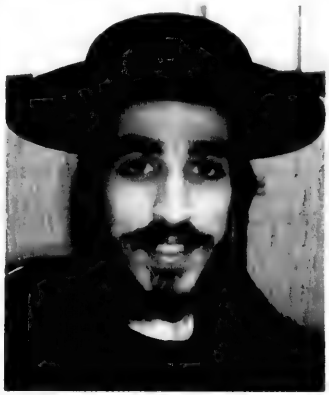
That former member is not credible at all, they said. Lev Tahor provided The CJN with an 11-page letter signed by four members of the Weingarten family, who knew Brudzewsky before they joined the group. The letter's allegations about Brudzewsky, dating back to their acquaintance in Monsey, N.Y., bring his testimony into question, they say.

As for fungus on the feet, a Montreal dermatologist spent several hours at the Lev Tahor community in Ste. Agathe, examined 61 children and found nothing out of the ordinary. The minor skin conditions she discovered were nothing more than what you'd find in any population, she said.

Referring to another child worker's allegation – that children were given melatonin – Weingarten said not every parent used the hormone, which is used to help them sleep, not to calm them. "You can see how ridiculous" the allegation is, he said.



Yakev Weingarten

As for other charges, which originated in Ontario, not Quebec, an Ontario judge has already overturned a removal order that had placed two children in foster care. In that case, a toddler was taken into protective custody over what appeared to be bruising on the face. It was nothing more than the remains of a permanent marker and the efforts of the parents to wash it off, the group's spokesmen said.

In a 2-1/2-hour visit earlier this month to the Lev Tahor shtetl, located on the outskirts of Chatham, I found dozens of smiling children, curious about the newcomer and eager to have their photos taken. Boys were in school, studying Judaic subjects. Boys and girls are educated separately.

The children seemed happy and well-fed and showed no signs of fear or distrust. The boys wore the same sort of black garb, crowned with a type of pillbox hat.

The girls, from a very young age, were dressed in black robes and head coverings that have led some to dub Lev Tahor the "Jewish Taliban."

The men wear long black coats and wide-brimmed hats, similar to those of other ultra-Orthodox groups. The women's clothing was designed by Lev Tahor members after they researched traditional European Jewish clothing, Weingarten said. Bringing up some images on his laptop, he showed groups of European Jews wearing similar long-flowing robes, perhaps from the 19th century.

For Lev Tahor, those were the good old days. "We're more old-fashioned," Goldman acknowledged. "We go to the sources. We don't believe in any compromise. We think it's authentic Judaism. We want to go backwards. We understand that our great-great-grandparents were smarter than us.

"We can see in the old literature that the people were very, very clever. They saw that to serve HaShem, there's no need to make a compromise."

It was that refusal to compromise that drove Lev Tahor to Ontario, they explained. At the heart of the issue was their desire to educate their children as they saw fit, without being forced to include subjects anathema to them – evolution and homosexuality.

"There's one curriculum that every child in Quebec must study, and there's no exception. It's against the Jewish religion and it's not just our problem," Goldman said, referring to other religious groups in the province.

Though Lev Tahor had been living in Quebec for nearly 20 years, their lives changed after a CBC radio documentary aired in October 2011.

"They said our schools don't go the same way as the Ministry of Education. That invited the government to come. We knew we [couldn't] comply exactly with them," Goldman said.

"Evolution, homosexuality, that goes against our religion. Evolution means there's no Creator. We can't teach that," he said.

The group researched other Canadian jurisdictions and determined that Ontario provided the best opportunity to homeschool their children, teach them the required material while not violating their religious beliefs.

"Absolutely," Goldman said when asked if the children are taught secular subjects. But they do "mix in Torah together.

"The Torah talks about a lot of subjects," including geometry, mathematics, biology. "We do learn secular subjects in a religious way," he said.

In April 2013 – long before the November court ruling in Quebec – the group hired a real estate agent to find a suitable location, Rosner said. A site in Chatham-Kent was found, consisting of a row of 15 to 20 bungalows, side by side. Community members with school-aged children settled there; others rented apartments in town, in close proximity to each other. The other members remained in Quebec.

Uriel Goldman [Paul Lungen photos]

The spokesmen reject suggestions Lev Tahor has the characteristics of a cult. In a cult, people "have been brainwashed to accept beliefs and practices, not in a logical way, [through] mind control," said Weingarten. "Our message is open, and so, clean of all kinds of influences. We don't hide anything. We're so open with one message and it's that we want to keep the Torah as given.

"People can understand it… with his own logical opinion, can accept or reject a part, but it's a message that is clear." He said there is no charismatic leader, no appeal to emotions or to irrationality.

"Here it's clean and open," he said. "It's the Torah message."

The group prepares all its own food from scratch. Lev Tahor members buy kosher beef directly from the slaughterhouse. They don't trust the kashrut of meat sold in retail outlets, Goldman said.

The group's members rely largely on contributions from outside supporters for their subsistence.

Asked to explain the bad press the group has received over the years, the spokesmen said it goes back to the group's formative years in Israel. The group is openly anti-Zionist. They believe only the Messiah can establish a Jewish state.

That obviously goes against the grain in Israel and among Jewish communities around the world, for whom Israel is a centrepiece of their identity, they say.

When they first moved to Quebec about 20 years ago, an Israeli official expressed concerns to the Quebec media over the welfare of Lev Tahor children. The group's founder, Rabbi Shlomo Helbrans, had been convicted in New York of kidnapping a 13-year-old boy he had been tutoring. He served two years in jail. He returned to Israel and the group coalesced around him.

Goldman said Israeli authorities opposed the group because it is anti-Zionist. They are also angry that Rabbi Helbrans was granted refugee status by Canada.

As for their reception in Chatham, it's been only positive. "We've been received wonderfully," Rosner said. "During Chanukah we invited [our neighbours] to join us and to say hello. Many came daily to say, 'We support you.'"

"They feel we're being persecuted," Goldman said, adding locals from Chatham have attended court to show their support.

Where are our tzedakah-giving Buffetts?

Money Matters
Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Maimonides, the greatest codifier of Jewish law and the greatest of Jewish philosophers (not to mention the leading doctor of his age), writes that we are obligated to be meticulous in the mitzvah of tzedakah more than any other positive commandment, "as charity is sign of the righteous, the children of Abraham."

Thankfully, even many who are far removed from religious observance demonstrate their link to Abraham by their charitable giving. Abraham is the "father of many nations" and our society benefits greatly from the generosity of Canadians in so many fields each and every day. The $9.7 billion that Canadians donated in 2009 can and does accomplish much.

Yet if we dig a bit deeper, the numbers are not as encouraging. The Fraser Institute recently reported that 22.9 per cent of Canadians gave charity in 2011 (and that's down from 25.1 per cent who made donations in 2005). That, of course, means that 77.1 per cent of Canadians did not give. Furthermore Canadians gave 0.64 per cent of their income to charity. And sadly, but not surprisingly, Canadians are the second-most generous people on earth, second only to Americans, 26 per cent of whom gave an average of 1.33 per cent of their income to charity.

Jewish law considers two basic approaches to charitable giving. The first approach is that as long as there is poverty in the world, one should give away all of one's wealth, less one's basic living expenses. How can we indulge when so many go to bed hungry each night? Yet Jewish law rejects this approach – it's not any one person's obligation to solve the world's problems. Rather, one must donate between 10 and 20 per cent of one's income to charity and enjoy the blessings that God has bestowed upon us.

Those who are exceedingly wealthy and can easily afford to give more than 20 per cent should donate more. I'm not sure which of the two approaches Warren Buffett – who is giving away 99 per cent of his more than $50 billion in wealth – is following, but whatever it is, it should be the model for the multimillionaires of our community. His (along with Bill Gates') Giving Pledge Initiative, which urges the very wealthy to donate at least half their wealth to charity, is righteousness at its best. The wealthiest 100 Canadians have an estimated combined wealth of $230 billion. Imagine what kind of society we could create if each gave half of their wealth to charity?

Sadly, no such initiative exists in the Jewish world. It's both gratifying and frustrating to read the reports this week that the State of Israel will be investing billions of dollars to promote Jewish identity in the Diaspora over the next 20 years. By doing so, Israel is recognizing its responsibility to Jewish communities around the world. No longer will charity go only one way.

Yet as I have often noted – and it needs constant repetition – our Diaspora community is blessed with many people who are candidates for the Giving Pledge Initiative. Even if they gave "only" 10 per cent of their wealth to the Jewish community, the billions of dollars this would garner would transform not only our community, but the future of the Jewish People.

How goodly are thy tents – and cabins

Jewish & Digital
Mark Mietklewicz

The weather outside is blustery, but in a few short months, students will close their schoolbooks (and laptops, hopefully), and transform into campers piling into Jewish overnight camps. If you're looking for a camp, now is the time to choose. Here's help.

Where to start? The Association of Jewish Sponsored Camps has surveyed 175 camps, which you can filter for factors such as Jewish ritual observance, emphasis on sports and arts, and staffing ratios. [http://bit.ly/jcamp101] Doing Jewish in Toronto lists more than a dozen overnight camps in Ontario alone [bit.ly/jcamp102], while MyJewishLearning has six in Quebec, and others in B.C., Alberta, Manitoba and Nova Scotia. [bit.ly/jcamp103]

Overnight camp isn't cheap, but there is some assistance available to first-time campers through the One Happy Camper program. [bit.ly/jcamp104]

Consider seven key factors when choosing, says Steve Eller of Maryland's Beth Tfiloh Camps: general and special programming, staffing, dietary requirements, Hebrew language and Israeli culture, and the campers themselves. While Beth Tfiloh Camps hold Shabbat services that are "kosher-style," executive director Ed Cohen says parents looking for a strong Jewish camping experience should send their children elsewhere. [bit.ly/jcamp105]

Which brings us to a central question: how Jewish should a Jewish camp be? Writing in the Forward, Rebecca Spence wonders how kids are "supposed to cut loose when they're spending so much time learning to be observant Jews." Adds parent Barry Posner, "I just want the kids to be kids… They're very deeply steeped in Jewish values, heritage and learning, so for one or two months a year, let them have a vacation."

Rabbi Mitchell Cohen disagrees. Cohen is director of the National Ramah Commission, which operates camps affiliated with the Conservative movement. "Families who spend a fortune on day school education and then send their kids to non-religious programs in the summer in some ways are wasting their investment… The kids are getting all the academic knowledge critical for a Jewish education, and then not applying it with friends in a warm, fun atmosphere." [bit.ly/jcamp106]

How do Jewish camps shape campers' identities for a lifetime? Amy Sales is co-author of How Goodly Are Thy Tents: Summer Camps as Jewish Socializing Experiences. "Each camp has a very strong and intentional culture, camp by camp. Camp's power to socialize young Jews –How do I be a Jew? How do I be a member of the Jewish community? – depends on this culture." [bit.ly/jcamp107] The study, "Camp Works," from the Foundation for Jewish Camp, suggests that campers eventually have more Jewish friends, become members of synagogues, and are somewhat more likely to marry a Jewish partner. [bit.ly/jcamp108]

Ellen Nash, former director of Ontario's Camp Northland-B'nai Brith, says "around age nine or 10 is ideal for many kids… Twelve is sort of the top end." Ask yourself: "Do they like being with groups of kids? Are they comfortable sleeping over at other kids' houses? Those are good signs." [bit.ly/jcamp109]

The Family Education website has great articles about talking to your kids about camp, homesickness and even camp packing tips: "Send nothing to camp (except your child) that you can't afford to lose." [bit.ly/jcamp110]

What is our message?

Rabbi Nevo Zuckerman

Rabbinic Reflections

The world we live in today sends us messages constantly – they appear everywhere we turn and never seem to stop coming. What messages do we want to pass along to those around us and instil in them for future generations? Are we aware that our actions become the models and our messages the expectations that we set for those around us?

I was once present in a synagogue where there was to be a scholar-in-residence. As the rabbi rose from his seat to introduce the presenter, I observed a room of 300 praying individuals deplete by 50 as adults stood and walked out of the room. After a lovely introduction, the scholar-in-residence approached the congregation.

He began, "What message does it send to our children in the congregation that when the rabbi speaks, it is permissible to leave?"

Clearly I wasn't alone in my observation.

This is a question that has been resonating with me for years. As Jews, it is our obligation to open our eyes to the messages around us so that we can set an example and instil positive midot (character traits) in those around us. Each of our messages is different based on many factors. Often, our physical intention and mental direction put our action into auto drive, but we must recognize that this is observed by others as an example of our own midot. Each and every action must be done using a thought process to ensure our models and their messages come from the humblest of places.

Something also resonated with me while flipping through the radio the other day: a song called Wake Me Up by Avicii. I found the entire song to be meaningful and full of questions to ask ourselves. Here is a short part of the song:

"So wake me up when it's all over

When I'm wiser and I'm older

All this time I was finding myself, and I Didn't know I was lost."

We go through our lives with no real thought as to who we are or the messages that we want to pass on to future generations. Yet, often, we don't even know that we might be lost from our path. Shouldn't we consistently wonder, am I the role model that I want to be? Our Torah exemplifies how our models and messages are transmitted, through the actions of Moses.

Just a few weeks ago, it was Shabbat Shirah in the Book of Exodus. In this parashah (portion of the Torah), the Jewish People are standing between the sea and the Egyptians. God says to Moses, "Why do you cry out to Me?"

Moses stands for a few moments, then he models that the Jewish People must have emunah, (faith) in God. It is only then that the miracle of the parting of the sea takes place.

Let HaShem guide us, that we can answer our questions, choose our messages and wisely act upon them as well.

Pressure Russia on gay rights

From the Bimah

Rabbi Catharine Clark

The 2014 Winter Olympics open in Sochi, Russia, on Feb. 7. Russia will attempt to present itself on the international stage as a modern, democratic country. The truth, however, is far less pretty.

In June, the Russian parliament overwhelmingly passed a law barring "propaganda" about "non-traditional sexual relations" to minors. It is now illegal to speak in any public forum about being gay or lesbian as a normal expression of sexuality and family life. The very dark side of forcing LGBT Russians back into the closet is as predictable as it is dangerous. In the months since the law went into effect, human rights and LGBT advocates in Russia have documented an uptick in workplace discrimination, hateful attacks in the media and violence against gay men and women.

Homophobia in Russia is a Jewish issue. From a religious perspective, the principle of kvod habriot, human dignity, is violated by the vicious silencing of LGBT Russians.

The view through the lens of history is just as sharp. Fomenting hatred of a minority group to shift attention from a troubled economy and repressive government is a long-wielded political tool. Such scapegoating of a minority group is dangerous. More than a century ago, it led to pogroms against Jews. It would be a tragedy if Russian history were to repeat itself with a different minority group in the role of victim.

Jews also know the risk of the international community glossing over human rights violations by an Olympic host nation. In 1936, Germany hosted the Olympics. Hitler saw the Games as an opportunity to showcase the racist ideology of the Nazi regime. German Jewish athletes, with one token exception, were not allowed to participate. The world did not stand up against Hitler at the Olympics, and what happened in the next decade is the worst possible outcome of such indifference and cowardice.

This time must be different. Many typical forms of Olympic protest, such as a boycott or participant protests, are not possibilities. The International Olympic Committee is insistent, hypocritically and as always, that the Games are non-political. In fact, athletes are being warned not to express political opinions at the Games.

Thus, our actions to support LGBT Russians must be creative. One good option is to promote the Principle 6 campaign. Principle 6 is a provision of the Olympic Charter prohibiting discrimination, including discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

A number of athletes have already signed-on to the Principle 6 campaign and will be affirming non-discrimination in words and attire. (The IOC can hardly complain when athletes voice their support of its own Charter's provision.) Principle 6 clothing is available online for all of us, not just Olympians. Wear a Principle 6 T-shirt when you get together with friends to watch your favorite Olympic sport. Proceeds will support Russian LGBT organizations.

The most important thing we can do, however, is to tune in to this issue in the months after Sochi. In the international spotlight, there are things even the strongest government can't get away with, but once the Olympics are over, LGBT Russians will need our support and watchdog eyes even more.

Harper welcomed as 'great friend to Israel'

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu welcomed Prime Minister Stephen Harper Sunday for a four-day visit, with Netanyahu praising the Canadian leader as "a great friend of Israel and the Jewish People."

Monday was the first full day of Harper's landmark first visit to Israel, accompanied by his wife, Laureen, and a delegation of some 150 to 200 cabinet ministers, community and business leaders, rabbis and media.

The goals for the visit, which is said to have great significance for Harper personally, included not only reinforcing Harper's longtime support for Israel, but establishing warmer relations between Canada and Israel's Palestinian and Jordanian neighbours.

Harper's entourage was greeted at Ben-Gurion Airport on Sunday afternoon by Minister of Foreign Affairs Avigdor Liberman and Vivian Bercovici, Canada's ambassador-designate to Israel.

In an official speech to the delegation, Netanyahu referred to Harper as "a great friend of Israel and the Jewish People."

He also praised Harper at his weekly cabinet meeting in Jerusalem.

"Today, for the first time, a great friend of the State of Israel, and a great friend of mine, is visiting Israel, Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper," he said Sunday at the start of the meeting.

"Canada is a faithful friend of the State of Israel. Under Stephen Harper's leadership, it has taken a moral and steadfast position against attempts to delegitimize the State of Israel. Prime Minister Harper has expressed a clear, brave and moral stand regarding the truth and in regard to the standards that the international community needs to adopt regarding the State of Israel and the conflict here.

"I think that this is worthy of praise and I welcome him on behalf of the government and people of Israel," Netanyahu said.

En route to his Jerusalem hotel, Harper's delegation made a brief stop at the Mount of Olives, a site of significance for all three of the country's major religions.

Monday morning, the prime minister's schedule began with an early-morning trip to the West Bank areas of Bethlehem and Ramallah, where he met with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

There, Harper announced $66 million in new aid for sustainable development and security reforms in the West Bank and Gaza. The money will fund training and technical assistance and help start-up businesses and existing micro, small and mid-sized enterprises. The initiative will particularly target women's entrepreneurship in these regions.

Harper said, "Canada looks forward to a bright future for all Palestinians, one in which security and prosperity are enjoyed in a viable and democratic Palestinian state. The support we are providing today will advance those goals by furthering the peace process, generating jobs and economic growth."

Harper was to address the Knesset later on Monday afternoon, marking the first time a sitting Canadian prime minister has addressed Israel's legislature.

During that address, Canadians living in Israel were planning to rally nearby to show support for Harper's unwavering stance on Israel.

Organizer Danny Hershtal told The CJN, "Israelis don't follow Canadian politics... they only know what happens in America. This rally is an outpouring of people who really wanted a chance to meet him or at least say thank you for his support."

Harper was not able to meet with the group, but they were hopeful that other delegates would be able to speak with them.

On Tuesday, Harper was scheduled to have official meetings with Israeli President Shimon Peres and Netanyahu before a visit to Yad Vashem, accompanied by Netanyahu, and then on to holy sites including the Western Wall.

On Wednesday, he was slated to head north to the Upper Galilee to inaugurate the future site of a bird sanctuary in the Hula Valley being named in his honour. He was also to receive an honorary doctorate from Tel Aviv University (TAU) and participate in a moderated question-and-answer session there with students.

Following the session at TAU, on Wednesday evening, Harper was to fly from Ben-Gurion Airport directly to Jordan for the remainder of his stay in the Middle East.

To honour Harper's visit, the Israeli Philatelic Service issued a commemorative postmark to recognize the shared values and strong economic, political and social ties between Canada and Israel.

Meanwhile, delegates with B'nai Brith Canada, which is normally a strong supporter of Harper and the Conservative party, circulated a media release Sunday complaining that its members had been excluded from a "private pre-dinner meeting" between Harper and Netanyahu.

"The strong voices of independent grassroots Jewry must not be excluded from official functions," said B'nai Brith CEO Frank Dimant, expressing concern that in their absence, there would be no strong advocate for a continued Jewish presence in the areas of Judea and Samaria.

Also over the weekend, Canadian media decried the up-to-200-member delegation travelling at taxpayer expense with Harper.

Back in Canada, the Globe and Mail called Harper's trip to Israel "one of the largest Canadian delegations mounted for a foreign visit." The delegation is reported to include six cabinet ministers, lawmakers, political staff and diplomats, as well as business people and leaders of Jewish community groups and other non-governmental organizations.

About 30 of the business and community leaders travelled on Harper's official airplane, while others flew commercially. Most will stay at hotels paid for by the government, the newspaper reported.

Among those in the delegation are business executives David Asper and Albert Reichmann, as well as Air Canada CEO Calin Rovinescu.

"It is a significant delegation. This is an important trip, and it's one that's generated a lot of interest," Jason MacDonald, Harper's communications director, said at a news briefing Jan. 17.

Ottawa has also paid for private participants in other large prime ministerial delegations, including on visits to China and India, according to the newspaper.

UNESCO exhibit cancellation slammed

JTA

WASHINGTON — The Barack Obama administration is "deeply disappointed" with a decision by UNESCO, the United Nation's cultural arm, to cancel the opening of an exhibition on the Jewish presence in the land of Israel and is seeking to have it rescheduled "as soon as possible."

Irina Bokova
[Wikimedia Commons]

Complaints by Arab states led the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) to cancel the exhibition, organized by the Simon Wiesenthal Center along with the governments of Canada and Montenegro. It was slated to open Jan. 20 at the UNESCO headquarters in Paris.

"The United States is deeply disappointed and has engaged with senior levels at UNESCO to confirm that the action to postpone does not represent a cancellation and to underscore our interest in seeing the exhibit proceed as soon as possible," a State Department official said, speaking with customary anonymity. "We trust that UNESCO will approach this issue fairly and in a manner consistent with the organization's guidelines and past precedent."

UNESCO director-general Irina Bokova said Wednesday in a letter to the Simon Wiesenthal Center that the exhibit, titled The People, the Book, the Land – 3,500 years of ties between the Jewish People and the Land of Israel, would be postponed indefinitely. She said the decision arose out of UNESCO's support for peace talks between Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

"We have a responsibility in ensuring that current efforts in this regard are not endangered," she wrote.

The cancellation followed a letter sent to Bokova on Jan. 14 by the Arab group at UNESCO. "The Arab group is deeply disturbed by the exhibition, which it condemns," said the letter from the group's president, Abdullah Elmealmi.

"This cause is championed by those who oppose peace efforts," Elmealmi said. "The media campaign accompanying the exhibition will inevitably damage the peace talks, the incessant efforts of U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry and UNESCO's neutrality."

The State Department official said the exhibition comported with UNESCO's mission of cultural preservation and education. "UNESCO was designed to foster just this kind of discussion and interaction between civil society and member states, and the United States firmly supports the right of civil society in member states such as the Wiesenthal Center to be heard and to contribute to UNESCO's mission," the official said.

In an email, the Simon Wiesenthal Center's director of international affairs, Shimon Samuels, wrote that the centre was outraged by Bokova's decision. He called for an email campaign opposing cancellation.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu also slammed UNESCO for cancelling the opening of an exhibition on the Jewish presence in the land of Israel.

"The explanation given was that it would harm the negotiations," Netanyahu said Sunday at the start of the weekly cabinet meeting. "It would not harm the negotiations. Negotiations are based on facts, on the truth, which is never harmful."

Knesset bill would create one chief rabbi

JTA

JERUSALEM — A Knesset committee has voted to approve a bill that would create one chief rabbi position instead of the current two.

The Knesset ministerial committee for legislation voted Sunday to approve the legislation, proposed by Justice Minister Tzipi Livni of the Hatnua Party, and co-sponsored by Religious Affairs Minister Naftali Bennett and lawmaker Eli Ben-Dahan of the Jewish Home Party.

The bill must be approved by cabinet, then pass three readings in the Knesset in order to become law. It would take effect after the 10-year terms of the current chief rabbis, Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi David Lau and Sephardi Chief Rabbi Yitzhak Yosef, expire.

"In a state where there is only one president, one Supreme Court president, one prime minister and one chief of general staff, there is no way to justify the doubling of the position of chief rabbi," Livni said. "We have to rid ourselves of the old-fashioned division of ancestral congregations and start bringing the country together."

The new law also would make the rabbinical courts independent of the office of the chief rabbinate, rather than the current situation in which the two chief rabbis alternate serving as the head of the Rabbinate Council and as chief religious court judge, of the Higher Rabbinical Court.

UN to host March of the Living exhibit

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

"I never had a chance to say goodbye to my mother. We didn't know we had to say goodbye... And I am an old woman today and I never made peace with the fact that I never had that last hug and kiss.

"I am only asking you to work for a world where nobody will ever have to live memories like mine ever again. Please heal the world."

For 25 years, teenagers have been travelling to Europe on the International March of the Living (MOL), visiting once vibrant Jewish communities and the Nazi death camps where millions were murdered.

Survivors have joined the March in recent years, among them Judy Weissenberg Cohen, a native of Hungary who never said goodbye to her mother.

Weissenberg Cohen last saw her mother at the selection process alongside the train tracks in Birkenau in May 1944. The sharing of her memories and the admonition to create a world where memories like hers cannot happen again have been incorporated as part of the theme of an exhibit that will be hosted at the United Nations beginning on Jan. 28.

Titled When You Listen to a Witness, You Become a Witness, the exhibit features images taken over the lifespan of the International March of the Living, poems and prose by young participants, testimony by survivors and an interactive component in which visitors will be asked to record their own commitments to make the world a better place.

Those pledges will be input onto iPads and transcribed onto plaques that will be posted on the MOL website and planted in the grounds at Birkenau, along with thousands of other plaques of visitors to the death camp.

"The centre point of the exhibit is the contrast between the death marches of 70 years ago and the March of the Living march today," said Eli Rubenstein, national director of MOL Canada and one of the creators of the exhibit. Some survivors who participated in the MOL actually experienced the death marches of 1945.

One of the best-known is the one from Auschwitz-Birkenau. As Red Army forces approached from the east, the Nazis evacuated the camp. Those prisoners able to walk were force-marched west to other camps. Many died en route. The exhibit is scheduled to open on Jan. 28, one day after International Holocaust Remembrance Day, the annual day of commemoration established by the United Nations that coincides with the day in 1945 that Auschwitz was liberated.

The exhibit was created by a panel of MOL executives and includes a substantial Canadian contribution. In addition to Weissenberg Cohen, other Canadian survivors featured in the exhibition include Nate Leipciger, Bill Glied, Mayer and Rena Schondorf, Max Illand and Anita Ekstein.

Images snapped by five Canadian photographers are included, while the poems and prose of Canadian teenagers feature prominently as well.

The images and the written words highlight just how emotional and difficult it can be for survivors to relive their painful experiences, Rubenstein said. For many survivors, it means visiting the scene of so much pain and heartache. For the students, "for the first time in their lives they're coming across ultimate evil."

Since its inception, March of the Living has brought more than 200,000 students to Europe, along with thousands of survivors. "The survivors tell their stories in the very places where the tragedies unfolded, and the students listen," Rubenstein said.

Many of the students return to their homes dedicated to community service, he added.

The exhibit will run through the end of February.

Lighting designer's show honours his mother

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Itai Erdal

Itai Erdal is about to take his 2010 one-man-show back on the road with performances from the Yukon to the Maritimes.

A few years ago, the 39-year-old lighting designer's mother was diagnosed with lung cancer. Hearing that she had just nine months to live, he headed to his native Israel to spend time with her and document the last year of her life.

"She had a very strong personality, and she was also an atheist. She didn't think she was going to heaven or hell and was very matter of fact about her death… It was kind of her idea to make a documentary," he said.

Instead of a documentary, he ended up incorporating the footage into his show, How to Disappear Completely, so although it's a one-man-show, there are several characters on screens, including his mother.

Since 2010, he's taken the show on the road across the continent. He won an award for best direction for his performance from SummerWorks Performance Festival, the largest juried theatre festival in Canada.

He said the show has allowed him to connect with audiences everywhere, dealing with grief and other issues about fatal illness such as the euthanasia debate.

"I've got an amazing reaction from people who tell me life stories about people who died, and that the play has made them face their own grief easier," he told The CJN.

Erdal has been working in live performance for decades now, but he's usually not found on stage. Instead, he sits in his lighting booth, subtly changing the show's mood. He is currently in Toronto lighting the Pleiades Theatre's upcoming production of Manon, Sandra and the Virgin Mary, which runs until Feb. 2.

He said his love of lighting began when he was a 16-year-old with an interest in photography.

"I'm really into composition and doing pretty things, and lighting is a way to make compositions with lights really," he said. "I always felt it was an intimate part of telling the story."

He said the lighting of a show can drastically alter the performance. It can offer subtle cues to the audience, for example, by changing the temperature of the colours – going from warmer lights to cooler ones, just enough to change the atmosphere without notifying the audience that it's changed.

In each show, he works with the director to determine the best lighting for each scene, though he said his expertise means he can sometimes surprise the direction and take the story to another level in ways the director hadn't imagined.

He said it's all thanks to his career in lighting direction that he was able to make his one-man show.

"I realized I'm in a unique position where I've been doing well as a lighting designer… so I can afford to do a show," he said, adding that he's never acted before, but he's very comfortable on stage.

Since light direction plays a major role in his life, it's only natural that it's an integral aspect of the show, too. He controls his own lighting from the stage, using it as a tool to tell his story.

"It's about lighting, it's about my mom and how she died… It's about every aspect of my life, but mostly about a relationship between a mother and son," he said. "It couldn't be [performed by] anybody else but me."

Women's health brand goes global 'overnight'

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Women in the Middle East, Turkey and the Caspian Sea region will now have access to femMED products, a Canada-based line of women's natural health supplements that address a wide variety of health concerns.

In November 2013, femMED partnered with NewBridge Pharmaceuticals, an international company headquartered in Dubai. "We became a global brand literally overnight," said Shawna Page, CEO and founder of femMED.

As a Toronto Bay Street business executive for 20 years, Page felt it was time to step back and pause. "Being an entrepreneur was the furthest thing from my mind," she told The CJN.

Shawna Page, CEO and founder of femMed

"When I reached 42 years of age, my hormones were playing havoc with my body. I set out to alleviate my symptoms and soon recognized there was nowhere I could go to get what I needed to help solve my health concerns," she said.

Identifying a market niche, Page hired a broker in November 2007 to get her a time slot with Shoppers Drug Mart where she could present her ideas.

"I had no bottles and no formulas, only a 'concept' of making women's health simple. I left the meeting with four weeks to build the company with my two founding partners: my husband, Steven Page, and Roy Segal. Within that time, we created five formulas, got a name, did all of our branding and developed ideas for driving sales. We returned four weeks later, and left that second meeting with a promise from Shoppers Drug Mart to launch femMED across the country.

"In April 2008, we officially launched," Page said.

The company has grown from a five-product line with an exclusive distribution at Shoppers Drug Mart stores to 13 products available at 3,500 retail locations across Canada, and in the United States through an exclusive deal with the Duane Reade chain, owned by Walgreen's.

Page and her team set out to simplify women's health concerns by developing multi-ingredient products that were simple to understand and easy to self-select from the shelf.

The femMED product range includes solutions for hormonal issues (including PMS, perimenopause and menopause), prenatal concerns, bone health, breast health, hair, skin, nails, energy – the list goes on. The supplements are free of fillers, additives, artificial colours and preservatives.

"The market is filled with single-ingredient products such as the letter vitamins A, B, C, D and E, and minerals such as zinc, calcium and magnesium. No one had taken on the task of formulating a line of products for women that address their most common health concerns, at every age and stage of life. Our formulas have anywhere from eight to 28 ingredients.

"We take the thinking out of it to make it easier to self-select what a woman knows is right for her. The way we do that is how we name our products. For example, sleep: when a woman hasn't been able to sleep or can't fall asleep or stay asleep, that's the name of a product that will resonate with her. She will understand and self-select what is right for her, rather than have to ask a stock person. There are no misunderstandings," Page said.

Since femMED is a private company, Page would not disclose the exact amount of capital invested, but she did say several million dollars was raised.

"I raised my first round of capital – well over a million dollars – on a concept," she said.

Seventy per cent of femMED's advertising is now digital, employing search engine marketing and search engine optimization.

"We do YouTube 30-second spots and TV specialty channels like the Women's Network. We spend a lot of money every year to grow the business and encourage trial, and raise awareness of the brand," she said. "Our sales in the United States are generated through direct response. We go to the consumer using radio advertising, newspaper and direct mail. The radio spot will drive the consumer to our website and they will purchase online.

"I created the line for me, so I had me at the heart of it. When you are putting something in your body, it has to be the best that money can buy. Our products retail for about $30. That's a $1-a-day mentality," Page said.

The company increased its sales by 60 per cent in 2012-13. "This has been a monumental year for us," she said.

Over the next 12 to 18 months, femMED will expand its business to produce formulas for manMED, kiddieMED, teenMED and animal branding – aniMED.

Ice Storm Forces Reena Individuals From Their Homes

An Open Letter of Profound Thanks to the Staff at Reena

On behalf of the members of the Reena Board of Directors, we extend a deep and sincere Thank You to the staff who were on duty during the December Ice Storm and to others who interrupted their planned vacations to support efforts to relocate those individuals supported by Reena who were in difficult situations. In total 89 people were moved from 12 locations including our three ElderHomes – an enormous task which, under the direction of Sandy Stemp, Reena COO, was carried out smoothly, effectively, and with a great deal of physical effort!

Many, many people pitched in and did so with total dedication to the care and well-being of the people living in Reena homes. Front-line staff, supervisors, managers, property as well as administration staff – all worked together and accomplished the myriad tasks necessary to move so many individuals to the Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre or to the Reena Community Residence where they would be safe and warm.

Some snapshots

- firemen carrying individuals from the second floor of Weldrick and Reena staff trying to pick them up!

- Judaic/Volunteer department buying out No Frills and personally expensing the whole amount since the store didn't accept the company visa!

- Reena Community Residence staff welcoming 33 people to their building, finding spaces and settling everyone incredibly well, taking it all in stride as though they get 33 house guests every day, what a fabulous team at RCR!

- the Supervisor at Reena's home for children advocating for her kids not to move and making plans even through the dark and cold, knowing what works for them

- property staff for delivering cots all over the city and coordinating all the other property deliveries, issuing taxi chits and managing related tasks

- supervisors who were on vacation showing up on e-mail and obviously working

- our incredible On-Call Team who worked non-stop, thinking of all possible issues and putting things in place. They were wonderful, calm, cool, even when exhausted

- all the Supervisors, going to locations, making plans, supporting individuals and staff, figuring out the logistics of who was moving where and how, managing very challenging staffing issues in the peak of vacation time

- wonderful support workers staying late to ensure the individuals were settled after relocating, helping other locations, working extended shifts, taking everything in stride, working in the dark, cold and then packing - bedding, toiletries, medications, supplies, special diets.

- our IT department making late night visits to reboot our computer and phone systems to enable contact within our system

- and most importantly – when it was deemed safe to do so, returning all individuals, and their belongings intact, back to their homes after their great adventure.

It is heartening to know that when there is a need, even with their own families impacted, Reena personnel really come through! We thank them again for showing up, offering assistance and putting in so many extra hours to ensure the continued high level of support of the individuals at Reena.

Reena staff should be very proud of what they have all done for the wonderful people we support.

Jewish travel in Poland today

Jewish Poland Revisited: Heritage Tourism in Unquiet Places
Erica Lehrer
Indiana University Press

In my detailed, richly illustrated but 10-year-old Polish travel guide, Kazimierz, the old Jewish quarter of Krakow, warrants barely a mention. Erica Lehrer's recent study offers dramatic proof of the changes in Polish-Jewish networks over the past decade and a half, while asking, too, what impact such changes will have on contemporary Jewish identity and culture.

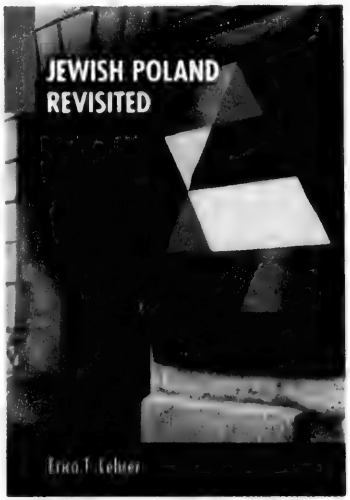
Though Lehrer is interested in broader Polish developments, the focus of her research is Kazimierz, which, centuries ago, was a village on the outskirts of Krakow, but with time became a thriving Jewish quarter and a major portion of the old city. In 1939, its 45,000 Jews made up one-quarter of the royal city's population.

Because the German military command was stationed in Krakow, its Renaissance-era buildings were spared the destruction that befell other major Jewish Polish centres such as Warsaw. However, the post-war decades of Soviet Communism took their toll – Nowa Huta, the monstrous steel plant on the outskirts of the city, was meant to draw workers away from the influence of Polish intellectuals and Catholic leaders.

Under the Polish Communists, Kazimierz's stock of historic synagogues and churches, its prewar tenements, fell into disrepair, while ongoing questions about property ownership, created by the wartime massacre of the local population, left many buildings in real estate limbo, vacant and unsellable. Still, in 1978, UNESCO recognized Kazimierz as a world heritage site, honouring the value of what was an "architecturally intact, historic Jewish town."

Jewish Poland Revisited is a book about present, not past, events in Kazimierz and though it must take into consideration the damage done by German occupation, it means to examine what Lehrer calls "Post-Holocaust reconciliation." By this she means recent developments – most of them beginning in the early '90s, the first post-Communist years – aimed at "reconnection and the creation of new networks that extend across the boundaries generated by group suffering."

This phenomenon has many forms of expression, some of which Lehrer views with wholehearted hopefulness, while others raise questions and critique. She acknowledges that as early as the 1970s, Soviet-enforced censorship of Jewish organizations and cultural activity led to interest among non-Jewish Poles in "Jews and activities on their behalf" as part of a "progressive politics" of resistance to church and government power.



In the '90s, pioneering efforts at cultural reconciliation, highlighted by Krakow's annual Festival of Jewish Culture, along with nascent touring and guiding efforts by Poles, led to a changing atmosphere for Jewish-Polish dialogue.

One of the oddest chapters in the revival of Kazimierz came with the arrival in 1994 of Steven Spielberg and his crew of film technicians and Hollywood stars to make Schindler's List. Spielberg chose Kazimierz for shooting his scenes, rather than Podgorze, the actual locale across the Vistula of the wartime Jewish ghetto and the Schindler factory. Re-created Jewish storefronts appeared in Kazimierz's main square, and the neighbourhood attained cachet as a tourist site in part because of film sets left intact after their usefulness as set locations had past.

Now, at the actual Schindler building across the river, there is an excellent museum focused on the war years and Oskar Schindler's activities. In Kazimierz, supported by increased tourism and the success of the cultural festival, there is real interest in the neighbourhood's history, its remarkable architecture and its burgeoning heritage, café and musical culture.

Lehrer is also interested in reconciliation that seems to stand on ambiguous or even troubling ground, and this is most directly addressed in her chapter titled "Traveling Tschotschkes and 'Post-Jewish' Culture."

The "tschotschkes" under discussion are the handiwork of a tradition of Polish woodcarvers, whose toy-sized subjects include a somewhat limited array of Polish Jewish types from the prewar era. Dressed in black yeshiva garb, or decked out with neatly reproduced fur chassidic shtreimlach, these figures predate recent tourism developments and are related to a Polish woodcarving tradition that embraces elaborate beehives and Christmas crèche scenarios. In a recent museum exhibit at the Ethnographic Museum in Krakow, Lehrer's research led to a display of these carvings, alongside substantial in-house and online discussion of how such carvings might (or might not) represent a form of reconciliation between Poles and Jews.

Some visitors respond to the carvings' presence in Kazimierz shops as they might to "black-faced lawn ornaments or tobacco-store Indians." Others are ardent collectors and request purpose-made figures from better-known carvers. One of the carvers Lehrer interviews extensively has found a dedicated venue in the Szeroka Square Jarden bookstore, where he displays his increasing array of carved Jews: a minyan encircled by a single tallit, klezmorim, a man clutching a goose, a "rare couple embracing a row of children."

The carvings can be seen as part of a large array of Jewish remnants on the Polish landscape, which include small- town synagogue buildings now used as libraries; restored cemetery grounds so completely desecrated by the Germans they appear today as rural parks; and, more troublingly, the ongoing discovery of Jewish gravestones in postwar structures and street paving.

The unquiet nature of Poland as a Jewish heritage place is changing rapidly, and Lehrer's Jewish Poland Revisited is an up-to-date and detailed guide to the shifting landscape.

Beggar's Opera coming to York U theatre

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Fourth-year York University fine arts student Sarah Chahley is starring in Theatre @ York's The Beggar's Opera, at the Sandra Faire and Ivan Fecan Theatre Jan. 28 to Feb. 1.

Originally staged in London, England, in 1728, this version of the play by John Gay is adapted and directed by Gwen Dobie.

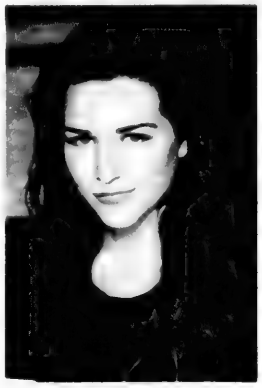
This production unfolds as a play within a play. It tells the tale of corruption, social inequality and wrongdoings.

"The Beggar's Opera was written by John Gay as an anti-opera to satirize what his colleagues were doing at the time," says Chahley. "Instead of having beautiful arias, they are much more folk arias. It takes place in a prison, [and] outlines that people with money can get away with anything, even when they are in lock-up. If you have money, you have freedom in this world.

"Gwen Dobie chose to modernize it by making it set in a modern-day jail and having us as prisoners putting on The Beggar's Opera, so that we can make it relevant to the financial situation that we are in now."

Chahley plays Mrs. Peachum. She and her husband are the "pimps" of the criminals. "We send out highwaymen and they work for us to bring back money, goods and anything we can make money from on the black market, and as a result, we prevent them from being hanged. So, as soon as they are no longer of use to us, they are on the block to be hanged."

She says the play shows that money doesn't really buy happiness, but the manipulation of money gets you into horrible situations.



Sarah Chahley

Chahley caught the acting bug early, attending local drama programs as a kid. Her first foray into performing in theatrical productions was at Camp Wahanowin in Orillia, Ont., and she appeared in a number of high school productions. At York, she has performed in a range of plays from August Strindberg to Shakespeare.

The actor says being Jewish affects her art a lot. Last year, she played a Polish Jewish girl who has to pretend to be German in the play Our Class

"My family are Polish Jews, and I, in the play, as a result of a German officer being fond of me, had to completely let go of all my beliefs, to be a German, essentially."

She says that really brought it all home to her, "just in the realization of what my ancestors went through to get to Canada. I got to bring and offer to the class the real revelation and my grandfather and grandmother's knowledge and experience of that time. Our Class wouldn't have otherwise had that perspective."

In addition to her theatrical work, she has also studied film acting, and she was able to work on independent films by the university's film students.

"I realized how much I have to learn about that side of performance," Chahley says. "My first step is to get as much experience on film as possible. I love theatre, but I have a love for the perfection that can be obtained in cinema. I would like to learn and master that as much as I can."

Spotlight to shine on Israeli culture

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The Spotlight on Israeli Culture, a two-month showcase of Israeli music, theatre, film, dance and visual arts described as the first event of its kind, will be presented in Toronto in February and March.

Organized by the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation, the exhibits and performances will be held in venues throughout the city, including the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company, the Julie M. Gallery for Contemporary Art, the Koffler Centre of the Arts and the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

"There is so much spectacular Israeli culture, so many spectacular performances and art… I think Israel is in a golden age, a cultural golden age," said Cheryl Wetstein, who has been serving for the past seven years as the executive director of the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation, which recently celebrated its 50th anniversary.

"There is so much energy, so much creativity. They talk about Israel as the startup nation, but there is also Israel as the art-up nation."

Wetstein said she's been working very closely over the past year with Rebecca Singh, director of cultural affairs at the Consulate General of Israel in Toronto and Western Canada, to encourage other cultural organizations in the city to showcase Israeli work throughout the months of February and March.

"The idea is to bring together people who are doing their own thing and to encourage people in this time frame to showcase Israelis," Wetstein said.

"The Toronto Jewish Film Festival always has a Chai Tea [film screening] event in February, so we co-ordinated with them that this is when they would do an Israeli film."

Wetstein insisted that organizing the spotlight was very much a group effort.

"We're not producing these shows… The presenters are the people putting this on. Our support has been more in the administrative and in the publicity… but not in the actual production of the shows," she said.

The Israeli culture spotlight includes, but is not limited to:

- the theatre production of An Israeli Love Story, a true story about a young girl named Margalit and an idealistic kibbutz pioneer and soldier in the Palmach, named Ami;
- a screening of Igor and The Cranes' Journey, an Israeli film presented by the Toronto Jewish Film Festival and the Toronto Jewish Film Society, about an 11-year-old Russian boy who has to start a new life in Israel following his parents' divorce;
- an Israeli jazz showcase, presented by Toronto Downtown Jazz and the Consulate General of Israel in association with The Ashkenaz Foundation, featuring the Gilad Hekselman Trio, the Shai Maestro Trio, and the Toronto-based, Juno award nominated David Buchbinder Ensemble;
- a visual art exhibit called Harissa, Honey & Hysop: Photos of North African Food, featuring the work of Nelli Sheffer, Israel's top food photographer, who travelled to North Africa in search of foods that have become an integral part of the cuisine in Israel, where more than half the Jewish population is Sephardi.

Wetstein said the spotlight falls in line with the mission of the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation, which is to present Israeli culture in Canada, and to act as a cultural bridge.

"The idea is to showcase this to the general population, just to show what Israel has to offer," she said.

"I think that Israel gets seen by the general public mainly in terms of the conflict, in terms of the difficulties, and I think it's important for people to see that Israel is much more than that. All of these artists are acting as ambassadors for Israel and showing Israel's cultural side."

EYE ON ARTS

By BILL GLADSTONE

VIDEO PERFORMANCE WORKS BY SIGALIT LANDAU AT KOFFLER GALLERY

Moving to Stand Still, a solo retrospective exhibition by Israeli artist Sigalit Landau, is the second exhibition in the Koffler Gallery's new downtown home.

Curated by gallery director Mona Filip, the exhibition brings together six video performance works, shown for the first time in Canada, offering a poetic investigation with global resonance of the political and environmental realities of Israel.

In Barbed Hula (2000), the artist spins a barbed wire hoop around her bare waist, while DeadSee (2005) confronts the ecological consequences of massive agricultural exploitation. The video Azkelon (2011) highlights a children's game of borders on the beach between Palestinian children of Gaza and Jewish children of Ashkelon, while Laces (also 2011) focuses on a young girl playing beneath a negotiation table while adults discuss potentially serious implications above.

The Koffler presentation of Moving to Stand Still is its only North American stop on an international tour that also includes Moscow, Johannesburg, Be'er Sheva, Rome, Gdansk and Tromso. Artscape Youngplace, 180 Shaw St., Feb. 6 to April 6. Opens with a free public reception, Feb. 6, 6 to 9 p.m. kofflerarts.org

Theatre Improv: Golden Ages – The Completely Improvised Musical is a two-act musical with a twist: it's largely improvisational, based on audience suggestion. The period can be any decade from the 1930s to the present (it changes each time), the seven-piece orchestra improvises the music and the four main actors improvise their characters' backstories. Produced by Alan Kliffer. Annex Theatre, 730 Bathurst St., every third Monday of the month (8 p.m.) $10

Another Kliffer-produced improvised show, Mixed Company, features actors who find out their stage partners and scenes when they arrive at the theatre; then they pick out their costumes, props and minimal set pieces. Comedy Bar, 945 Bloor St. W. Runs the last Monday of each month beginning Jan. 27, 8 p.m. $12

Kosher caterer chooses local products where possible

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Moshe Oziel, founder and president of Clearwater Catering Inc., said one of the things that separates his company from other kosher options in the city is his emphasis on the farm to table concept, a movement focused on the production of local, seasonal and often, but not always, organic food.

"Today we aren't entirely aware of the way our food is grown, handled and processed," said 30-year-old Oziel, who founded his full-service, kosher catering company (under COR) in 2009.

"There are GMOs [genetically modified organisms] and pesticides, and unfortunately, we're getting away from natural foods, so farm to table is perfect for those who are interested in eating locally grown, seasonal food," he said.

The movement strives to bring the food industry back to the days when people grew most of their own food or bought from local farmers. Today, much of the produce found in grocery stores comes from halfway around the world and is in transit for days before it reaches the dinner table.

The longer it takes for food to get from the farm to your home, the more nutrition and flavour is lost.

"If I can get potatoes that came from a local farm less than 100 kilometres away from here, as opposed to something that has been harvested before its time, shipped over here and ripened on a truck, my product is going to be better and my clients are going to taste the difference," Oziel said.

"I love farming and I love agriculture and I always have a garden at my house... I plant things seasonally. Farm to table is a good way for me to incorporate that into the culinary world, but it's also a lifestyle."

Because farm to table produce has so much natural flavour, Oziel said he doesn't feel the need to mask his dishes with competing flavours.

"I personally enjoy a lot of fresh food, vegan and vegetarian dishes, not using too many ingredients, but using just enough so that the freshness of the ingredients is able to shine through," he said.

"I like to use quality products, such as cold-pressed olive oils, grapeseed oils, the right legumes – it's about using the best products, not just the ones that are readily available at the cheapest price."

Oziel, who calls himself a "self-taught cook," has been part of the kosher catering business for more than seven years.

Although not classically trained, ("I went to the school of hard knocks"), he immersed himself, as much as possible, in the art of food preparation.

"I guess you could say I went to my mom's chef school. My mom is an amazing cook," he said.

"When I was 25, I bought books that had the curriculums of the top culinary schools in the United States, and I would go home after work and study the curriculum on my own to understand the business of cooking and catering and understand food."

His hands-on experience comes from working with talented chefs including Erin Green, currently the executive chef with Taste Culinary Inc., who studied at the Culinary Institute of America, one of the best culinary schools in the world.

When Oziel worked under her, she was the executive chef for Rhonda Litwack Fine Foods, which has since closed down.

"She was a really talented chef and she knew a lot, so she gave me the inspiration to study the art. She made me pay my dues," he recalled.

Oziel also worked alongside Carlo Lazzarino, who is currently the pastry chef for the Terroni group of restaurants.

At Zuchter Berk Kosher Catering, Oziel served as both a chef and a mashgiach, and he also spent more than two years employed by PR Creative Caterers, another Toronto-based kosher company.

Throughout his years gaining experience in the industry, Oziel developed a love for this line of work.

"I love cooking, but more importantly, I love... the satisfaction that you can obtain from a final result. It's something that is really important me. I can cook an amazing dish and then I can experience the fruit from that labour right away. Our lives are based around food," he said.

"To see someone enjoy it is the thing I enjoy most about the whole process."

He said he hopes his full-service company, which provides a team of servers as well as chefs who cook on-site, will alleviate some of the stresses related with party planning.

Clearwater Catering offers a number of set menu choices, but Oziel said clients can customize their menu to reflect their personal tastes, dietary restrictions and budget.

"It's not all about me and the bottom dollar. I believe life is a series of experiences and we have to enjoy it as much as we can."

Territories belong to Israel, says Baker

Baker, the head of the forum's international action division, has argued that not only are the territories not occupied, they rightly and under international law belong to Israel.

The forum, a volunteer organization of more than 300 lawyers from around the world, cites Jews' indigenous rights to the land dating back 3,000 years. "Jews have legal, historic and indigenous rights, long before anyone else," Baker said.

The modern legal case for Jewish sovereignty can be traced back to the Balfour Declaration, the San Remo agreement, the mandate given the British by the League of Nations to hold the land in trust for the Jews, and the ratification by the United Nations of those rights, Baker argues. That includes the entire area west of the Jordan River.

"What we said is that Israel has the right to build settlements in Judea and Samaria," that the territories are not "occupied," but belong to Israel as of right, he told The CJN during a visit to Toronto last year.

Baker, who served on the Levy Committee, which reported two years ago on Israel's legal claim to the West Bank, wrote that the DFAIT website should not prejudge issues being negotiated between Israel and the Palestinians, including settlements and the disposition of the disputed territories.

"In this way, the policy statement would express Canada's support for the peace process in general terms, in the hope it will lead to a just, lasting and comprehensive peace settlement, but without entering into the negotiating issues," he wrote in the Jerusalem Post.

In an email response to CJN queries, Rick Roth, director of communications for Baird, stated: "The prime minister and minister Baird have articulated Canada's policy on Israel and the Middle East at great length since 2006.

"Israel has no greater friend in the world than Canada, and it is through our actions, not just words, that this rings true," he said.

From a parent of a sick child

Ask Ella
By Ella Burakowski

Dear Ella,

This year hasn't started out all that well. The day before the ice storm last month, Emily, my nine-year-old, took sick. She was lethargic, pale and confused, so I took her to the hospital while my husband stayed home with our seven-year-old.

Testing revealed a blood disorder. The next couple of weeks were brutal. I called work and said I wouldn't be back for a while, and my husband held down the fort at home, coming down to visit and relieve me every few days. I basically moved into the hospital with my daughter, who was scared and wanted her mommy.

As I write this, Emily is sleeping in her own bed, her red blood cell count has improved dramatically, and the doctors are hopeful that she'll be fine.

Our family sure could have used some friendship and support throughout this ordeal, but some of our friends were away on holidays and most who were in town were afraid to "bother" us. Are you kidding me? I needed a friendly visit, phone call or even a supportive text message.

My sister helped when she could, mostly on weekends, but she lives far away and has her own family. We have a large circle of friends, but with the exception of a couple of them, most wanted to "give us our space."

I'm hoping that by writing this, it will alert people not to be afraid to call when someone is in crisis. You're not bothering. I sure could have used a friendly face or a change of scenery, even if it was just company in the lobby for a coffee.

Friends are not supposed to be only for good times. I'm not going to be shy about this. I'm going to tell them how disappointed I am. This is not what I call friendship.

When the Going Gets Tough

Dear When the Going Gets Tough

First of all, it's fabulous to hear that Emily is doing better. There's nothing more important than that.

It's funny how people react in a crisis. Some step up to the plate, while others seem to disappear.

Let's face it: it's uncomfortable to talk to someone going through a difficult life event, whether it be a sick family member or a shivah. Like you say, people are afraid of saying or doing the wrong thing, making a stupid remark or being insensitive. It's easier to avoid the situation until things return to "normal."

But I'm with you. We need to educate people and let them know it's not OK to avoid difficult situations, especially when people close to you are suffering.

Here are some ground rules.

You're not bothering when you call. Do you have any idea how boring sitting in a hospital is? A phone call is a break, a time when a parent can vent. It doesn't matter what it's about, whether it's the lousy hospital food or how scared they are. You listen.

Even better, get down there and be with that parent. Bring some homemade food, a good book or a magazine. Call first, and offer to stop by their house to pick up anything they might need.

Being an early riser, when my nephew was in the hospital, I would get in my car at 5 a.m. and visit with my sister-in-law who was by his side. She appreciated the company, and I was there when the doctors made their rounds. I know she also appreciated being able to discuss their findings with a family member who cared.

Don't forget about dad who is home with the other child, holding down the fort, working, making sure his daughter gets to school, gets picked up, has dinner, and has to get down to see his other daughter and relieve his wife, too.

If you think it all sounds like a nightmare, you're right. Besides worrying about a sick child, the logistics of keeping the rest of the family from falling apart are important as well.

Take a casserole over, or a soup, salad or treat. Don't ask. Just do it.

When you're visiting, take your cues from your friend. If she or he needs to talk, you listen. If they want to hear about something else in the "outside world," then you talk, but never overstay your welcome. You need to have your radar on high alert, and sense when they need to rest. You can even offer to let them sleep or shower or go for a walk while you stay and hold down the fort, making sure their child is not alone.

Be a friend in good times and bad. It's part of life.

Pan-Asian fusion

Randy Fingrut
Special to The CJN

Pan-Asian fusion has established itself in Canada and is becoming increasingly trendy. Its popularity here is an indication that cultural boundaries around the world are becoming more flexible, and that Canada's growing population of Asian immigrants have transported their cuisine and cooking traditions with them.

Many Asian Canadians have been assimilating into Canadian culture, and so has traditional Asian food. This transformation, years ago, applied only to the mixing of Asian and Canadian food, but today, Pan-Asian fusion is the result of combining different components and methods from various Asian cultures and cuisines, including Chinese, Thai, Japanese, Indian, Vietnamese, Korean and Hawaiian Pacific Rim cuisine, (based on American, Chinese, Filipino, Japanese, Korean, Polynesian and Portuguese origins). They are now being fused together to create fresh, flavourful and exotic ethnic-inspired dishes that we Canadians crave.

Although most of us have never had the opportunity to visit Asia, we can create wonderful Pan-Asian fusion dishes at home. The secret is to research and use authentic Asian ingredients while bridging these new flavours with foods that you already know and enjoy. Open yourself up to the pure pleasure of savouring these dishes with an entirely new fusion flare.

PACIFIC RIM STYLE MEATLOAF

A delicious fusion meatloaf with a tropical twist.

1 1/2 cups panko Japanese bread crumbs
1 14 oz. can crushed pineapple, drained, reserve 2 tbsp. juice
2 eggs, beaten
2 tbsp. fresh chives, finely chopped
1 tbsp. grated fresh ginger
2 garlic cloves, finely chopped
1 tbsp. fresh coriander, chopped or 1 tsp. dried coriander
1 tsp. salt
1 tbsp. Hoisin sauce
2 lb. ground chicken

Topping
4 tbsp. hoisin sauce
2 tsp. rice wine vinegar
2 tbsp. pineapple juice
1 can pineapple rings for garnish

Prepare 2 Pyrex loaf pans by spraying them with canola oil. In a large bowl, combine panko crumbs, crushed pineapple, eggs, chives, ginger, garlic, coriander, salt and hoisin sauce.

Fill loaf pans with an equal amount of the chicken mixture. Combine topping ingredients in a small bowl, divide it in half, and spoon over the top of each loaf. Bake in a 350-degree oven for one hour. Let stand 5 minutes and, using an offset spatula, go around the edges and loosen the meat loaf from the loaf pan. Place a flat plate over the loaf pan and invert, draining off any juices. Place on a serving platter. Slice and garnish with pineapple rings.

SESAME DUMPLINGS

These tangy dumplings are wonderful served hot right from the pot, but are equally delicious the next day warmed up in the microwave or served cold over a bed of fresh Napa cabbage.

Dumplings
1 package wonton wrappers
1/4 lb. ground chicken
1 tsp. soy sauce
1 tsp. cornstarch
1/2 tsp. sesame oil
1 tbsp. finely chopped carrot
1 tsp. fresh ginger, grated
1 tbsp. chopped green onion or chives
Garnish/Salad
1/4 cup Napa cabbage, finely shredded
1/4 cup red pepper, finely chopped
1 1/2 tsp. fresh ginger, grated
2 tbsp. green onion, minced
Sauce
2 tbsp. sesame oil
1/4 cup soy sauce
3 tbsp. rice vinegar

In a small bowl, combine chicken, soy sauce, cornstarch, sesame oil, chopped carrot, ginger and green onion. Line a tray with parchment paper. Place wonton wrappers in a single layer on parchment paper, a few at a time. Spoon 1 tsp. of chicken mixture onto each wrapper. Moisten edges and fold into a half-moon around filling, squeezing to seal. Then gather up the flat side of the fold toward the centre and pinch – dumplings should look like small pouches. Continue until all wrappers are filled.

In large pot, bring water to boil. Gently put in wontons, reduce heat and cook for 5 minutes or until filling is no longer pink. Drain well and put in large bowl. Add Napa cabbage, red pepper ginger and green onion. Mix together the sesame oil, soy sauce and rice vinegar. Toss dumplings with mixture. Serve immediately.

What's for dinner?

Sue Epstein,
Special to The CJN

Laura Frankel, former executive chef of Wolfgang Puck's kosher restaurant and catering service in Chicago and owner-chef of Shallots Bistro in that city, has written a book called Jewish Slow Cooker Recipes.

Frankel calls her slow cooker her "Shabbat miracle machine," but has written this book to focus on using the slow cooker to produce satisfying, creative meals every day of the week, not just for Shabbat cholent. The recipes, however, are generally not the "throw stuff in the slow cooker and leave home" type. Many of the recipes have as many as 12 ingredients and seven or eight steps before you're ready to leave home for the day.

Another caveat – although you don't have to be kosher to love this book, it is aimed at a kosher audience. But I know very few, if any, who have meat, dairy and pareve slow cookers, thus limiting your ability to use some of the recipes.

That said, I think you'll love the dishes she presents. Using Frankel's recipes, you can free up oven and/or stovetop space by using your slow cooker. And the recipes are great! I would not have ever thought to use my slow cooker to make dishes like Hot Wings, Moroccan Lamb Tagine or Brown Sugar Glazed Corned Beef. And if you do have a dairy slow cooker, there are some amazing side dishes like Mushroom Stroganoff and desserts such as Black Forest Bread Pudding to be made in it.

Frankel says if you're a slow cooker fan you're sure to find new, exciting recipes in this book. If you're a bit more cautious, then maybe you'll find the inspiration to try slow cooking.

GARLICKY POT ROAST

Marinade:
3 tbsp. chopped garlic (about 4 large cloves)
3/4 cup light brown sugar
3/4 cup olive oil, plus extra for browning the roast
1/2 cup balsamic vinegar
2 tbsp. tomato paste
kosher salt and freshly ground black pepper
1 3-5-lb. chuck roast, fat trimmed olive oil
Sauce:
2 large Spanish onions, chopped
6 garlic cloves, chopped
1 cup dark beer such as Guinness or Aventinus
1 whole head of roasted garlic
2 cups chicken stock
1 cup crumbled gingersnaps (about 15 small cookies; store bought are fine)
1/4 cup tomato paste

Marinate the roast. In a bowl large enough to hold the roast, stir together the chopped garlic, brown sugar, olive oil, vinegar, tomato paste and 1 tablespoon each salt and pepper. Add the roast and turn it to coat on all sides. Cover the bowl and marinate for at least 3 hours, or overnight in the refrigerator.

Place a large sauté pan over medium heat. Lightly coat the bottom of the pan with olive oil. Remove the roast from the marinade and pat dry. Discard the marinade. Lightly season the roast with salt and pepper. Brown the meat on all sides, about 7 minutes per side. Set aside the roast but do not clean the pan.

Preheat a 6-1/2-quart slow cooker to high.

Make the sauce. Add the onions to the sauté pan and cook until brown, 3-5 minutes. Add the chopped garlic and cook for 2 to 3 minutes more, until the garlic is very fragrant and has softened slightly – do not let the garlic brown. Add the beer. Scrape up the browned bits with a wooden spoon or spatula. Transfer the mixture to the slow cooker insert.

Place the roast and any collected juices in the insert. Squeeze the roasted garlic out of the skin and into the insert. Add the stock, gingersnaps and tomato paste. Stir together. Cover and cook the roast on high for 7 to 8 hours, until it can be pierced easily with a fork.

Remove the roast from the cooker and keep warm. Strain the sauce before serving. Cut the roast into large chunks and serve hot with your choice of accompaniment. Pass the sauce. Makes 8 servings.

Where he went, what he saw, what it all means

Jennifer Tzivia MacLeod
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — Through words and actions, Prime Minister Stephen Harper showed on his visit to Israel last week that he "understands Jewish history and Jewish aspirations," says prominent Liberal MP Irwin Cotler.

The former cabinet minister said Harper's trip accomplished three main things. First, he was able "to express Canada's commitment to Israel as a matter of principle," through his Knesset address. Second, the prime minister succeeded in "furthering bilateral relations... not only between governments, but also between peoples." And, third, he succeeded in "warming the hearts of Israelis... that somebody would come here and not engage in the blame game."

The view from Israel

But despite his praise for the trip, Cotler told The CJN that it "might have resonated more back home" if Harper had broadened his delegation.

They didn't all get together, hold hands and sing Kumbaya, but they came pretty close.

Participants in Prime Minister Stephen Harper's trip to Israel were positively gushing about the prime minister's performance on the world stage, with several referring to his speech in the Knesset as the highlight.

Rabbis on the trip also mentioned the interaction between colleagues from various denominations of Judaism as a happy unintended consequence of the trip, which saw more than 200 community leaders, rabbis and businesspeople join the Canadian delegation as an "accompanying party."

Referring to Harper's address to the Knesset, Toronto lawyer Berl Nadler, a member of the board of directors of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) called it "a stirring piece of oratorical clarity on the issues."

Drabinsky Paroled

TORONTO — Former theatre mogul Garth Drabinsky was granted full parole last week. Drabinsky, 64, will now be able to serve out the remainder of his fraud sentence at home in Toronto. The ex-CEO of Livent was convicted in 2009, along with his friend, Myron Gottlieb, for falsifying financial statements, which ultimately led to the bankruptcy of what was North America's largest live-theatre company in 1998. It was Drabinsky's second attempt at gaining full parole. He was released on day parole last February.

WORLD

Madoff Heart Attack

NEW YORK — Ponzi schemer Bernard Madoff suffered a heart attack in jail. Madoff confirmed to CNBC that he was hospitalized last month after the attack. The Jan. 22 report said Madoff, 75, also is suffering from stage 4 kidney disease. Madoff is serving 150 years at a federal prison in Butner, N.C., for the largest Ponzi scheme in U.S. history. Many of his victims were Jewish groups.

Dieudonné Arrested

PARIS — French comedian Dieudonné M'bala M'bala was arrested for allegedly assaulting court officers who came to his home with notices for payments due on fines for inciting hatred against Jews. Dieudonné, who owes nearly $100,000 for several hate speech convictions, was arrested Jan. 21, AFP reported. He denies firing plastic projectiles at the bailiffs. Earlier this month, officials said they were investigating him on suspicion of funnelling proceeds from his shows to his partner and registering his possessions in her name to avoid having funds and property seized as payment for the overdue fines.

Ex-Meretz Head Dies

JERUSALEM — A former Israeli minister and leader of the left-wing Meretz party, Shulamit Aloni, died Jan. 24 at 86. A veteran of Israel's Independence War and a product of the Shomer Hatzair Zionist youth movement, Aloni entered politics in 1965 as an MK for what would become the Labor party. She broke away from Labor in 1973, leading the Ratz party, with an emphasis on civil rights and feminism. In 1992, Ratz coalesced with the left-wing Mapam movement, becoming the Meretz Party. Under her leadership, Meretz won 12 seats in the Knesset, setting the stage for the left-wing support then-prime minister Yitzhak Rabin needed the following year to sign the Oslo peace accords with the Palestinians.

MONTREAL — McGill University biochemistry professor Nahum Sonenberg is the co-winner of Israel's prestigious Wolf Prize in science for his discovery of the key regulators of protein synthesis in the body.

Nahum Sonenberg

Sonenberg, who won for medicine, is one of eight scientists from four countries among the winners announced Jan. 16.

Born in Germany, Sonenberg grew up and was educated in Israel, completing a PhD at the Weizmann Institute of Science. He has been teaching at McGill since 1979. He's currently a James McGill Professor in the department of biochemistry and a senior researcher at McGill's Rosalind and Morris Goodman Cancer Research Centre.

He'll share the $100,000 prize with Victor Ambros of the Harvard Medical School and Gary Ruvkun of the University of Massachusetts Medical School.

Established in 1978, the Wolf Prize is awarded in five categories: agriculture, chemistry, mathematics, medicine and the arts. One-third of all recipients have gone on to win a Nobel Prize.

Sonenberg will receive his prize in May at a state ceremony in the Knesset.

Former CHAT head, now in Manhattan welcomes idea

Girls done tfillin at Orthodox N.Y. high schools

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

A decision by two New York Orthodox high schools to allow female students to pray wearing tfillin has grabbed the attention of the Jewish media in the United States and Israel, and now Orthodox leaders in Canada are weighing in on the issue.

Earlier this month, SAR High School, a modern Orthodox school in Riverdale, N.Y., and Ramaz High School, a modern Orthodox school in Manhattan, announced within weeks of each other that girls are permitted to don tfillin during prayer services if they choose.

"Our school sees the role of women in Orthodox practice very positively and I think this is an inevitable outcome of increased Jewish education for girls and changing roles for women in every area of society," Paul Shaviv, head of school at Ramaz and former director of education of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, told The CJN last week.

"There are some Orthodox circles that will welcome it and some who will vigorously resist it. We welcome it," he added.

Current TanenbaumCHAT head of school Rabbi Lee Buckman, feels that this is a hot-button issue, not because it's halachically impermissible for women to wear tfillin, but because it's a practice that many Orthodox community members deem unacceptable.

"Acceptable religious practice is not determined exclusively by what halachic sources dictate. Communities also determine what is acceptable," Rabbi Buckman explained.

"For example, standards of conversion and kashrut vary from community to community, even when each asserts that its position is halachically defensible. Similarly, the decision about women wearing tfillin, while halachically defensible, will be unacceptable to some communities."

Paul Shaviv

But Rabbi N. Daniel Korobkin, senior rabbi at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation, said that it's inaccurate to say that women donning tfillin is not a halachic violation.

He referred to a quote by Rabbi Moshe Isserles in Chapter 38, section 3 of the Shulchan Aruch, where he states that "when it comes to time-bound commandments, women are exempt, but allowed to participate... But Rabbi Isserles states unequivocally that if a woman wishes to be stringent and to wear the tfillin, we are supposed to protest, and say that is not an appropriate thing to do," Rabbi Korobkin said.

"Not only should it not be encouraged, but it should be actively discouraged."

Harper gets up-close view of Syrian mess on Mideast trip

Reflecting on Prime Minister Stephen Harper's historic Jan. 20 speech to the Knesset, the Globe and Mail, in its editorial "Speaking on a matter of principle," noted, among other things, that he "pushed back at those who would single out Israel for criticism… while soft-pedalling the misdeeds of the neighbourhood's many less savoury regimes."

According to Reports
PAUL MICHAELS

On the subject of the less savoury regimes in the region: this column goes to press a day before the prime minister travels to Jordan, where he was scheduled to visit a Syrian refugee camp in which approximately 600,000 Syrian refugees languish. Their plight is shared by millions of other Syrians, many of them refugees in Lebanon and Turkey, or internally displaced within Syria itself. They have all suffered under the brutal repression of one of the least-savoury regimes not only in the region, but in the world – Bashar Assad's Russian- and Iranian-backed Alawite regime.

Early in January, when international attention to the tragedy of Syria was flagging, Robert Fulford reminded us in his National Post column, "Syria's sadistic survivor," that "Assad's war against his people is set to begin its fourth year." Sadistic indeed: "Assad has used poison gas against Syrian civilians and raised the estimated death count of the war to about 130,000." Against all earlier predictions, including U.S. President Barack Obama's less than a year ago, Assad will stop at nothing to survive.

"Peace negotiations are scheduled for later this month, and Assad's prime minister has announced in advance that anyone who thinks the regime will hand over power must be delusional," Fulford wrote.

In fact, the opening round of what's known as the "Geneva II" talks began Jan. 22 in what's typically described as the "peaceful" Swiss resort town of Montreux, a setting that couldn't be in greater contrast to the hell that's been unfolding in Syria the past few years. Further talks between Assad's delegation and the Syrian opposition are scheduled to continue two days later in Geneva.

Virtually no one holds out any prospect for progress on the vision set out more than a year ago in the "Geneva I" talks of establishing a transitional government – one that excludes Assad himself.

It was prescient of Fulford to refer to Assad's prime minister's "delusional" comment, since now that the talks are finally underway, the widely shared view is that as long as Russia, Iran and Iran's Lebanon-based proxy Hezbollah continue to support Bashar Assad (and there's no reason to assume they won't), it's nothing short of delusional to assume that he'll give up power – transitionally or otherwise.

Syria's tortuous mess is also immensely complicated by the growth of numerous Sunni jihadi factions, including foremost the Al Qaeda-linked group, the Islamic State of Syria and Iraq (ISIS), who are as busy fighting among themselves and against elements of the Free Syrian Army as they are fighting Assad's forces. And, like Assad's forces (including thousands of Hezbollah, Shia Iraqi and Iranian fighters), many of the Sunni jihadists also stand accused of atrocities.

Fulford cites Frederic Hof, described as the former American representative to the Syrian opposition, arguing that the jihadists have succeeded in making Assad "appear the less terrible alternative for Syria."

It's certainly fair to say that both of these sides seem to be in grotesque competition for something other than the "less terrible" alternative. It seems to vary by the day.

After all, on the eve of the Geneva II talks, a group of Qatari-commissioned lawyers (Qatar opposes Assad) released 55,000 images showing 11,000 prisoners, most aged 20 to 40, executed or tortured to death by the Assad regime. These gruesome images were verified as authentic by independent international experts.

It's no wonder that Hof, interviewed on BBC News America on Jan. 22, said that what's occurring in Syria is "a humanitarian abomination that's engulfing the entire region."

During his visit to Jordan, Harper will have had an opportunity to see evidence of this abomination up close.

Treating the foreigner with respect

Rose Fontanes, 47, a Filipina caregiver who lives and works in Tel Aviv, recently shot to fame after her star turn on the inaugural season of X-Factor Israel. The unlikely diva is the most recognizable face in Israel these days, but when she first auditioned for the televised singing competition, she tearfully admitted just how detached she felt from Israelis. In a segment that aired during an early episode, Rose told an interviewer: "I feel that everyone is looking at me like I am an alien."

That certainly appeared to be the case the first time Fontanes performed on X-Factor – no one quite knew what to make of her. As she made her way to centre stage, the cameras captured the quizzical and bemused looks of her fellow contestants and the panel of judges. Who was this foreign intruder?

Then she begun belting out a pitch-perfect rendition of Lady Gaga's You and I and the answer didn't seem to matter much anymore. Almost immediately, Israel fell in love with Rose. Week after week, she sang her heart out on TV – to Queen's Bohemian Rhapsody, Shirley Bassey's This Is My Life and Sinatra's My Way, among others – and Israelis responded by voting for Rose online and on their phones until she completed her improbable ascent to reality TV supremacy. It's a heartwarming story, especially for Filipinos, who deserve some good news in the wake of Typhoon Haiyan.

And yet Rose's comment from way back when about feeling like an alien remains, and it seemed especially poignant a few weeks ago when thousands of African migrants protested for days near the Knesset and in Tel Aviv. The migrants, mainly from Eritrea and Sudan, accuse the Israeli government of stalling on their asylum requests, which has forced many into detention and prison, and which the government has not entirely denied.

The migrants present an awkward dilemma for Israel. It is unclear what sort of long-term future they can reasonably expect in the Jewish state, and yet they deserve to have their voices heard and their complaints addressed – that is, after all, why they chose modern, democratic Israel over their backward, war-torn homelands. The mixed reaction to the migrants indicates Israelis are still grappling with how to move forward.

As for Rose, Israel's very own Susan Boyle, her X-Factor run proves that a non-Jewish foreigner can make it in Israel, at least as long as she has a wonderful talent to share. Given her unique story – and her penchant for singing the pants off of one classic after another – one senses that Rose has a long career ahead of her.

The Torah commands us to treat the ger (foreigner) with utmost respect, since we ourselves were once aliens in the land of Egypt. The rise of Rose Fontanes proves many Israelis – critically, younger ones – have taken that message to heart, and that the Jewish state can be a welcoming home to those who aren't. Israel gave Rose a chance to fulfil, as she put it on X-Factor, her "dream to be something else." Fifty-thousand-plus Africans are hoping they'll get the same shot.

Dry Bones

I would like to remind Independent Jewish Voices (IJV) ("Harper's Israel trip criticized," The CJN, Jan. 23) that Prime Minister Stephen Harper has cut out the waste, but has kept important social programs intact. His wise leadership has kept taxes in check in Canada while others have sunk into recession. Canada has been kept afloat by his steady and smart financial management.

Lashon hara, derogatory speech about another person, is not a good thing without justification. When that person, in this case the prime minister, has done all in his power to speak the truth about Israel and to balance his nuanced foreign policy instead of cowering to Islamists and leftists, as other world leaders are doing, it behooves even a member of an anti-Israel group such as IJV to give him a break.

Gary Gerofsky
Dundas, Ont.

UN must take a stand

Surely this is the last straw ("UNESCO exhibit cancellation slammed," The CJN Jan. 23). Can any civilized person not recognize the overt and shameless anti-Semitism displayed by the Arab League and the United Nations? Hitler and Goebbels would be proud of them.

If the leaders of the democracies don't immediately demand an apology from the UN and a restoration of the program, then the clash of civilizations is lost, and the jihadists have won.

The exhibition, The People, the Book, the Land – 3,500 years of ties between the Jewish People and the Land of Israel, deserves to be seen on UN property. No group of racists should be allowed to dominate the UN and subvert it from its mission, part of which is "to practise tolerance and live together in peace with one another as good neighbours."

Sharon's legacy

The CJN editorial of Jan. 16 ("Sharon's final lesson") suggests that former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon's bold move to disengage from Gaza was his best decision.

With the Hamas takeover in Gaza, subsequent attacks on Israel and repression of Palestinian democracy, it has become obvious to Israelis, from left to right, that the disengagement was a gamble for peace that Sharon lost – and is arguably the worst decision of his illustrious career.

Ezra Franken
Montreal

After the horrific events that occurred in the refugee camps of Sabra and Shatila, the Israeli government launched a full-scale inquiry and properly reprimanded and demoted Ariel Sharon for his failure in permitting a Christian militia to attack and murder innocent Palestinians.

In contrast, when Muslim terrorists and suicide bombers kill innocent Israelis, they are praised as heroes and martyrs, and streets are named in their honour. There is no rebuke by the government that sent them on their murderous campaigns. This celebration of murderous acts continues on a daily basis today in Syria and in Iraq. The countries that fund and support terrorists, such as Iran, are never taken to task, nor are there motions of condemnation at the United Nations or expressions of regret by Muslim religious leaders. At Sabra and Shatila Israel accepted its share of responsibility, but in point of fact, the murders were committed by Christians not Jews.

Jewish RCAF veterans sought

I am writing a book about my father, Abe Ferstman, who served in the Royal Canadian Air Force as a bomber navigator during World War II. He died prematurely in 1977. I would like to interview other Jewish RCAF veterans about their experiences as Jews in uniform during the war, for example about Jewish chaplains and religious services, relations with non-Jews, any discrimination encountered, etc.

I would also be pleased to hear from anyone who knew my father at any stage of his life. I can be reached at 416-922-0305 or brian@ferstmanlaw.com.

Is Harper-led Canada Israel's new best friend?

Sean Savage
JNS.org

With the Middle East in turmoil, Europe moving backward, and the United States fatigued from years of war and recession, Canada has emerged as a staunch supporter of Israel. At a time when Israel is routinely singled out for condemnation, Canada has been at the forefront of defending Israel and criticizing its enemies.

This outspokenness comes amid the growing economic and political clout of Canada, a country that is traditionally accustomed to keeping a low profile internationally. When Prime Minister Stephen Harper embarked on his first trip to Israel from Jan. 19 to 22, the Jewish state rolled out the red carpet for him. Has Israel found a new best friend?

"[Harper] really understands the importance and moral justification for a Jewish state. He gets it," Rabbi Philip Scheim of Toronto's Beth David Synagogue, who travelled as part of Harper's delegation to Israel, told JNS.org.

Since World War II, Canada's foreign policy has centered on multilateralism and participation in international organizations. But Harper has moved beyond those traditional corridors and has focused on a stronger and more independent Canadian foreign policy.

Part of this new independent foreign policy has been supporting Israel, an often-unpopular position around the world. Immediately upon taking office in 2006, Harper bucked world opinion and supported Israel in its war against the Lebanese terror group Hezbollah. This outward support has continued in every military engagement Israel has been involved in since.

Canada has also supported Israel in the United Nations, joining only a handful of small nations and the United States in voting against upgrading the Palestinians to non-member observer state status in 2012 and repeatedly voting against resolutions condemning Israel.

On Iran, Harper has aligned more closely with Israel's position than with the positions of some its allies in Europe and the United States. In 2012, Harper cut diplomatic ties with Iran and expelled Iranian diplomats from Ottawa. More recently, Foreign Minister John Baird said he was "deeply skeptical" of the interim nuclear deal with Iran and reaffirmed that Canada would maintain its sanctions again Iran.

These positions have come with some costs for Canada. In a shocking outcome in 2010, Canada lost a bid for a seat on the UN Security Council. Some speculated that Harper's strong pro-Israel stance might have played a role in straining relations with the UN's large Islamic bloc.

"This is really something we have not seen before, a prime minister of Canada taking a really strong position at a great political cost. He knows that this could really hurt him in some areas, but he doesn't care, because this is what he really believes," Rabbi Scheim told JNS.org.

Harper, an evangelical Christian who belongs to the Colorado-based Christian and Missionary Alliance church, has also come under fire from critics who claim that his faith influences his foreign policy.

"My sense is that there may be an element of religious connection [to Israel]. But that is certainly not all of it; I think it also has to do with his sense of the world, his sense of justice and understanding of history, especially Jewish history," Rabbi Scheim said.

But Canada, like its American and European allies, still has a vocal anti-Israel movement within the country, particularly on university campuses and in certain media outlets.

In 2005, Toronto's York University became the first school to host "Israeli Apartheid Week" (IAW), and its student union, the largest in Canada, voted last year to divest from Israel. IAW events have also spread to other Canadian universities.

Harper's recent selection of Toronto lawyer Vivian Bercovici, who is Jewish and has been a vocal supporter of Israel, to be Canada's next ambassador to Israel has also drawn some criticism in the Canadian media. In an interview with Baird, CBC anchor Evan Solomon, who is also Jewish, questioned whether it is appropriate to appoint a pro-Israel Jew to be the ambassador to Israel.

"Vivian Bercovici is Jewish, so there are going to be some questions. Why not appoint someone who doesn't even have the perception of any kind of bias [in favour of Israel]?" Solomon asked.

Yet despite the criticism of Harper's pro-Israel stance, Shimon Fogel, CEO of Canada's Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, credits Harper for making support for Israel a mainstream position in Canada.

"Adopting those positions on Israel is what a mainstream party should look like in the eyes of most of the Canadian electorate today," Fogel said.

This support has shown itself in the positions of the leaders of Canada's two main opposition parties, the centrist Liberal party and the centre-left New Democratic Party (NDP).

"Yes, the Liberal party will have Israel's back – but not because it's in our political interests to do so at home, but because it is the right thing to do on the world stage," Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau recently told a crowd of 500 people at Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Toronto.

Meanwhile, NDP Leader Thomas Mulcair has strong Jewish ties. Mulcair's wife is a French Sephardi Jew whose parents are Holocaust survivors, and his children are being raised Jewish. Mulcair has described himself as an "ardent supporter of Israel in all instances."

Amid the political implications, one aspect of Harper's trip that may be overlooked is the economic component. Like Israel, Canada has successfully weathered the global economic crisis over the past five years and has invested heavily in high-tech areas.

Joining Harper on the trip to Israel were 30 of Canada's top business executives, including David Asper and Albert Reichmann, as well as Air Canada CEO Calin Rovinescu.

At a time when few countries around the world come to Israel's defence, Rabbi Scheim believes the trip is an opportunity for Israel to finally express its appreciation for Harper.

"He is very well-known in Israel. You go to the U.S., nobody knows who the prime minister of Canada is, but in Israel, the whole country knows him and I am very proud to identify with him," Rabbi Scheim said.

Why are my conversions not valid in Israel?

Rabbi Julie Schonfeld in New York

The good news is in: American modern Orthodox Rabbi Avi Weiss' conversions will be accepted in Israel.

I am glad to see that the religious integrity and leadership of Rabbi Weiss has been acknowledged. Undoubtedly, this course correction on the part of the Israeli Chief Rabbinate is due in part to the hue and cry of influential Jewish leaders, many of whom are not Orthodox, who are to be praised for speaking out.

Of course, my conversions are not recognized in Israel. Nor are those of my 1,700 Conservative colleagues, my 2,000 Reform colleagues and my 300 Reconstructionist colleagues. The fact that Jewish leaders and major organizations are stepping up to address the issue of pluralism is a wonderful step forward and one that we should all applaud and encourage.

But why does this only happen when an Orthodox rabbi's character is at stake? Where is the statement on behalf of the nearly 4,000 rabbis and the 85 per cent of Diaspora Jewry we represent when the derogation of our Judaism is black-letter law in Israel?

Rabbi Weiss himself wrote in October in the Times of Israel that "Israel as a state should give equal opportunities to the Conservative and Reform movements. Their rabbis should be able to conduct weddings and conversions."

Leaders of Jewish organizations and public figures have criticized Israel in defence of Weiss, something far too few have been willing to do for the Conservative and Reform movements. This double standard was expressed stunningly by U.S. Rep. Eliot Engel.

"If Rabbi Weiss' credentials are rejected – an Orthodox leader with decades of experience – what does that portend for other strands of American Judaism?" asked the New York lawmaker, who represents Rabbi Weiss' district in the House of Representatives.

What indeed?

To those who issued statements in defense of Rabbi Weiss that were both bold and effective, I thank you. And I call upon you to now issue a statement for Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist rabbis. Notify your board members and donors that the rabbis who married them, bar mitzvahed their children, buried their parents, and converted their sons- and daughters-in-law do not deserve to be called rabbis in the eyes of the Israeli rabbinate. Tell them that none of their life-cycle events count and that the State of Israel does not really think they are Jews for religious purposes.

The American Jewish establishment will not stand for the discrediting of someone known as an Orthodox rabbi. That's better than nothing, I suppose, but far less than the Jewish public deserves. Where is the outrage for us? Has the Chief Rabbinate exported its hatred of the streams? Has the Israeli political leadership exported its willingness to ignore the mistreatment of the vast majority of the world's Jews by an extremist minority?

If we take a long, hard look at ourselves, the best explanation probably comes from a paraphrase of the famous Pogo cartoon, "We have met the enemies and they are (also) us."

Structural intolerance and discrimination do not only harm the abused, but obscure the human dignity of every individual. Such intolerance, allowed to not only survive, but thrive, engenders an atmosphere in which it is impossible to treat even your friends and colleagues as your equals. In the words of Maimonides, "A rabbinic prohibition is always and everywhere superseded for the sake of human dignity."

No one is asking any rabbi or Jew to hold personally by the interpretations of a community or a rabbi with whom they do not agree. But all must be equally respected and acknowledged.

American Jewish leaders derive legitimate authority only on the basis of their integrity and willingness to seek and grasp the convictions of the people they represent. In my experience, the colleagues I serve with are dedicated beyond measure to these ideals. That is what has made this chapter so chilling. We are becoming invisible to ourselves.

As it is written in Ethics of the Fathers, "Other people's dignity should be as precious to you as your own."

Rabbi Julie Schonfeld is executive vice-president of the Rabbinical Assembly, the international association of Conservative and Masorti rabbis.

Israel is coming to Reform Judaism

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Anat Hoffman is arguably Israel's best known and most effective social activist. What for her admirers is her claim to fame is for her detractors proof of her notoriety: her leadership of the Women of the Wall campaign that demands the same rights for women as for men to pray and read Torah there. The movement has galvanized women from across the religious spectrum and compelled the government of Israel to seek ways to accommodate their liturgical demands.

Hoffman is also executive director of the Israel Reform movement's Religious Action Center, a potent advocacy organization on behalf of religious pluralism and equal treatment of all sections of society. It's a staunch champion of the rights of individuals, Arabs no less than Jews, migrants no less than citizens.

Last month, Hoffman was honoured by the Women of Reform Judaism (WRJ) at its convention in San Diego, Calif., with the prestigious Jane Evans Award. The WRJ has its roots in the United States and Canada, but of late, it has also created an outpost in Israel.

Reform Judaism has had a continuous and growing institutional presence in Israel since soon after the establishment of the state. Some of its pioneers emigrated there much earlier. But in recent decades, Hoffman and the many Reform rabbis, trained and ordained in Israel have helped bring Israel to Reform Judaism.

In her address at the award ceremony, she offered some practical advice about bringing Israel even closer. Her recommendations are relevant to all Jews in the Diaspora, irrespective of affiliation.

To start with, she urged her audience to be informed about every aspect of life in Israel, not only its security concerns. We should know about the many wonderful things that are happening there – spiritually, culturally and economically – far beyond what the media abroad normally report.

Hoffman's words reminded me that Israelis regard themselves as being among the happiest people in the world.

Her approach was supported by others who attended the convention, held concurrently and partly jointly with the Biennial of the Union for Reform Judaism, the North American umbrella organization. The Forward quoted David Siegel, Israel's consul general in Los Angeles, asking rhetorically, "How many people would be excited about Israel if the only conversations were about 'crisis'?"

Akiva Tor, another Israeli official, suggested that "the weighty issues of strategic concern should not be the entrance point, but an outgrowth of a love and understanding of Israel."

Hoffman urged Jews in the Diaspora to support causes in Israel that reflect their values. She obviously had in mind those who vote left-of-centre in their home countries yet ally themselves with right-wing, even reactionary, forces in Israel. She urged us to refuse to choose between our progressive values and our commitment to Israel. As she put it: "Let your frustrations motivate your actions."

A good way of knowing Israel is at least by visiting it as often as possible. She asked the convention delegates to try to see more than the tourist guides are willing to show. "Less Roman ruins and more freedom rides," she said.

The reported presence of many Israeli Reform leaders at both conventions was further evidence of how Israel has come into the centre of the movement. This was also reflected in the new links forged with the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem. Its founder, the late Rabbi David Hartman, had inspired and guided the current president of American Reform Judaism, Rabbi Rick Jacobs.

Like Rabbi Eric Yoffie, his predecessor in office, Rabbi Jacobs is a committed Zionist and determined to steer Reform Judaism in North America toward ever greater involvement with Israel, not only to support progressive forces there, but to be open to all facets of what Israel brings to every Jew in the Diaspora.

Rather than only stressing the inequalities that, alas, still exist also when it comes to religious pluralism, the Reform movement is involved with the wide range of challenges that contemporary Zionism in general and Israel in particular are facing.

Though frustrations understandably continue to evoke critical responses in some quarters, the leaders of Reform Judaism are determined not to allow the many barriers placed along its path to deter it from active and continued involvement with all aspects of Israeli life.

Bringing Israel to Reform Judaism, in addition to bringing Reform Judaism to Israel, has benefited both immeasurably.

Ex-Montrealer tapped for Bank of Israel post

CJN Staff

MONTREAL — Montreal native Nadine Baudot-Trajtenberg has been recommended by Bank of Israel governor Karnit Flug to serve as her deputy.

Currently deputy dean of economics at the Interdisciplinary Centre Herzliya, Baudot-Trajtenberg is a former adviser to the Canadian government who moved to Israel in 1987 when she began a career with Bank Hapoalim, where she served as a senior analyst and later in several management positions.

A Université de Montréal graduate, she holds a master's degree from Oxford University and a PhD from Harvard University. She is an expert in macroeconomics and capital markets.

Her husband, Manuel Trajtenberg, was the head of the Israeli government committee created in response to the 2011 demonstrations for social justice held in Tel Aviv. He currently chairs the planning and budgeting committee at the Council for Higher Education.

Baudot-Trajtenberg's appointment is subject to cabinet approval. If she's confirmed, it would be the first time two women were at the helm of Israel's central bank.

In the 1980s, she advised the Canadian department of finance on tax reform.

Her nomination for the five-year term was announced Jan. 16. The office of deputy governor is renewable for one additional term.

In the Bank of Israel announcement, Flug stated, "Nadine has vast experience that extends to a variety of topics. There are many challenges facing the Bank of Israel, and I am confident that Nadine's talent and experience will help us deal with them."

Leading Winnipeg federation is a family affair

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For David Kroft, the new president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, community service runs in the family.

In fact, Kroft is the third member of his family to serve as leader of the community. His father, Manitoba Court of Appeals Justice Guy Kroft, was a president of both the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (a forerunner of the federation) and the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba, and his older brother, Jonathan, served a two-year term as president of the federation in 2008 and 2009.

"I come from a family where we were taught the importance of community," Kroft told The CJN. "I hope to be able to bring my own touch, vision and style to my new role as federation president."

A lawyer with the firm Fillmore Riley – he was called to the bar in 1990 – he has served on the federation board for more than 20 years. He was elected to a standard two-year term as president.

The federation's first major order of business under Kroft's leadership will be finding a replacement for Bob Freedman, its retiring executive director who has been in the position for more than 25 years. He has announced his intention to retire by the end of August.

"The search process for a successor is ongoing," Kroft said. "A new executive director after all this time is a significant change. He or she will create a new dynamic."

"We are so lucky that our community is growing and our CJA campaign continues to grow year after year," he said. "Our greatest growth among donors is in the 30-to-45 demographic. That has been a result of our community planning and outreach efforts."

He also spoke of the federation's ongoing effort to reach out to people who may be flying under the radar and find ways to attract them to affiliate with the community. He also spoke of the need to make participation in the Jewish community more affordable.

David Kroft

Kroft noted that over the past few years, the federation has been tackling the issue of a general decrease in synagogue attendance.

"We have to figure out what role we should be playing in trying to increase synagogue attendance," he said. "The health of our synagogues is important to the overall health of our community."

He also spoke of his desire to encourage a sense of teamwork among the federation's beneficiary agencies.

"We are all part of the whole," he said.

In addition to his service to the Winnipeg Jewish community over the years, Kroft has been a longtime board member of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs and its predecessor agency, the Canada-Israel Committee.

He noted that he has been to Israel several times and was scheduled to go last winter for a CIJA board meeting, but he "got stuck in Toronto by a snowstorm."

This year, he was among 10 members of Winnipeg's Jewish community who accompanied Prime Minister Stephen Harper on his trip to Israel.

Kroft and his wife, Ellen, are the parents of three school-age children. Outside of work and volunteer activities, Kroft keeps busy driving his children to various programs. He also tries to run three or four times a week, an activity he describes as a good stress reliever.

Not a new trend, says Shaviv

He said if a woman came to him privately and she had displayed a "unique level of spiritual devotion… and she really felt tfillin was going to bring her to the next level, then only on an individual basis would I allow a woman to don the tfillin, but it would be done in absolute secrecy… I might tell her… do it privately, because we don't want to set an example for other people who have not risen to that level."

Goldie Plotkin, wife of Rabbi Avraham Plotkin, spiritual leader of Chabad of Markham, said she believes that women who want to wear tfillin are suffering from an inferiority complex.

"To me, when a woman takes [this] mitzvah, she has some kind of an inferiority complex by saying I need to be a man," Plotkin said.

"That's my personal feeling. I know that when a woman understands… what her essence is, what God needs from her, not what she wants for herself and what she wants to gain from religion… when she does it with all her essence, she won't need that tfillin to reach that level.

"There are so many mitzvahs that we know are ours, that we have to perfect. We're not on the level of grabbing at other mitzvahs that we don't know well… There are so many mitzvahs that we have to perfect before we can start jumping on a bandwagon and saying, 'But I also want to do tfillin.' That's not your mitzvah!"

Rabbi Buckman said that currently no girls put on tfillin at TanenbaumCHAT, but if anyone expressed interest in doing so, they would be allowed to.

"I would support her and applaud her courage. If she requested to learn more deeply about women and halachah or women wearing tfillin, I would connect her with a teacher who would gladly study with her."

In a statement, SAR High School principal Rabbi Tully Harcsztark wrote that "this is not the common practice in our community… [but] I felt it appropriate to create a space at SAR for tefilah that is meaningful to them."

Shaviv, who feels that too many "newspaper inches are being spent on what is not really a very high-profile issue," said this isn't a new trend.

"Contrary to what was reported in the press, there have been a small number of girls at Ramaz putting on tfillin without anyone making any fuss about it whatsoever. And I think if you look carefully in other Orthodox circles, [you'd see] discreetly, individual women have made that choice," Shaviv said.

"Over the years, we have looked at the wonderfully positive achievements of our female students in the school. We are otherwise a totally egalitarian school – the girls and boys are in co-ed classes in every subject. We have girls who are outstanding Talmud scholars… We encourage our girls to take their Judaism very seriously."

Shaviv believes that the role of women in Jewish ritual and practice will continue to be "one of the dividing lines between… modern Orthodoxy and Haredi Orthodoxy."

We're 'freiers' and proud of it

Having made aliyah from Canada last August, I'm one of the newest Israelis, but this week, I'm also one of the proudest.

When Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper told the Knesset Jan. 21, that Canadians will support Israel regardless of any economic or political benefit in return, he said, "This is a very Canadian trait… to do something for no reason other than it is right." Everybody in the room burst out laughing, but I wasn't sure why.

Actually, I can understand why the Israelis in the room laughed. Here in Israel, doing something without being assured of a reward is the definition of a freier – a sucker (pronounced "fryer" as in deep-fryer). The freier is constantly mocked here – the pleasant guy who stands nicely in lineups, who lets someone else take the lone taxi, who tips readily, who doesn't snatch what is rightfully his.

A series of advertisements for a new Israeli phone company revolves around the line: "Enough of being a freier." You've been paying too much, now it's time to look out for yourself.

For those Israeli Knesset members, perhaps it was funny to hear Harper offering Canada as a korban (sacrifice, or doormat), helping out Israel and getting nothing in return.

But at that moment, my heart soared. If Canada wants to be the freier among the nations, I'm there. However, that wasn't when Harper truly won my heart, as a Canadian who is now Israeli, and vice versa.

That came later, when he said, "Israelis have endured attacks and slanders beyond counting and have never known a day of true peace." I felt a chill: he had me.

Harper gets it in a way that Jewish community leaders promised the whole world would get it after 9/11: that the threat of terror anytime, anywhere undermines the quality of life everywhere. There can be no true peace if violence is lurking around the corner. But after 9/11, the world didn't get it. The world packed up its bags and left the tragedy behind.

Some of us – Harper included – didn't forget. Not only because we're haunted by the images of tragedy, but because our dedication is infused with the glow of ancient spiritual meaning: the religious imperative to support Israel.

It's no coincidence that Harper is an evangelical Christian whose spiritual convictions are perhaps the primary source of his steadfast support of Israel. For me, this parallels my commitment to make aliyah, to live here, to walk those holy four amot (cubits) in the Land of Israel – a mitzvah that's said to be equal to all the mitzvot of the Torah – every day of my life.

As Rev. David Wells, general superintendent of the Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada, told me before Harper's Knesset speech, the steadfast Christian commitment to Israel flows naturally from their belief in God's everlasting covenant with the Jewish People.

Back in Canada, Harper stands to gain little for his staunch support of Israel, and despite renewed alliances with the Palestinian Authority, he may even lose some allies back at home. But I still believe his support is consistent with Canadians' image on the global stage – the perennial nice guy. And sure, if you want to put it that way, the freier.

Yet in another way, I've noticed since we moved here in August that there is nothing more Israeli than being a freier. I believe that deep down inside (though Israelis may be afraid to face this truth), all Israelis are freiers. Israeli society revolves around a remarkably caring ethic that goes all the way back to the Torah and Tanach. They just sometimes hide it very well: that's the prickly-pear "sabra" for you.

Israel itself, whenever it's able, has always been the first to rush out into the world and help others – for example, in Japan after the tsunami or in the Philippines after the recent typhoon – regardless of any economic or political benefit in return (although building international goodwill can't hurt).

Canadian Jews and Israelis may shake their heads when they hear that Harper has pledged an additional $66 million in Canadian aid to the Palestinian Authority. Enough of being a freier, they might say. Doesn't he understand that these are not our eager partners in peace? Yet it was clear from Harper's speech that his moral expectations cut across the board: he's calling on Israel's neighbours to take greater responsibility for the peace process.

Growing up as a Canadian Jew, at all Hebrew school assemblies, as well as synagogue and community events, there were two flags at the front of the room – Canadian and Israeli. Two flags, two national anthems, two loyalties – but never divided loyalties. Israeli values, we were told, were Canadian values.

Arriving in Israel last August, I actually cried, thinking I might never see those flags together again. As much as I love "kachol-lavan" (blue and white), I missed its red-and-white counterpart.

Witnessing blue and red waving together over the Knesset Jan. 21, against a golden Jerusalem sunset, felt like a homecoming, reinforcing the rightness of our decision to live here, but also confirming that – just as I always thought – there's no conflict. I can remain happily Israeli, happily Canadian – freier to the world, and fiercely, fiercely proud of it.

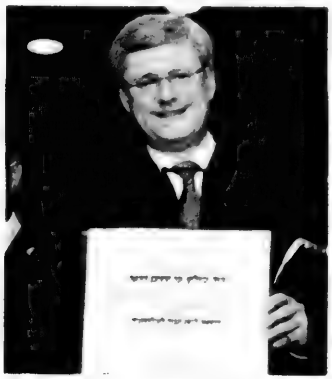
Aislin rejects accusations over Harper cartoon

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The editorial cartoonist who goes by the pen name Aislin came under fire last week for a drawing of Prime Minister Stephen Harper with a blue-and-white Israeli flag over his face that critics said is "incendiary" and comes close to employing age-old stereotypes of Jews who have the power to silence critics.



Prime Minister Stephen Harper received an honorary doctorate from Tel Aviv University. [Israel Sun photo]

But Terry Mosher says these interpretations are far from what he intended, which was no more than a legitimate critique of Harper's policies, ones he says diverge from Canada's traditionally more "balanced" approach to the Middle East.

"The s--t hit the fan, just like in the old days," Mosher told The CJN.

The Jan. 21 cartoon prompted outrage from community organizations as well as angry calls and letters to the Montreal Gazette, where it was published.

In the drawing, only Harper's eyes and nostrils are exposed, leading the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) to comment, "We object to his incendiary visual suggesting that Israel is somehow muzzling Canada's foreign policy… It is ludicrous for Aislin to suggest that Canada's support would lead Prime Minister Harper to be mute on any divergence of opinion."

B'nai Brith Canada went further, terming the cartoon "vile, grotesque and simply offensive," and calling for an apology.

"It is all too similar to perverted images vilifying Harper which we have seen during his trip to the Middle East. It treads close to borrowing the age-old canard that Jews wield undue influence to silence critics of Israel," said Frank Dimant, CEO of B'nai Brith.

But Mosher said the cartoon wasn't meant to suggest Harper was being muzzled. It was drawn to compare the prime minister to a sports fan, the kind who draw a blue maple leaf on their faces to show their support for the local hockey team.

"I painted the flag to indicate he's a fan of Israel," Mosher said.

"I was watching TV with him and [Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu. It was just a simple thought that given Canada's more balanced policy in the past, he's gone overboard."

"There's nothing ominous" in the drawing, just a suggestion that Canada's policy should be more balanced, he added.

Mosher said the drawing was vetted by seasoned staff at the Gazette, who saw it as a legitimate political cartoon.

"There's not bad intent aimed at the Jewish People or Israel," he said. "It's simply a comment of me being worried about Canadian policy with regard to the Middle East."

It's not the first time one of his cartoons on the Middle East has landed him in hot water. In 1997 – "the old days" he referred to – he was harshly criticized by Muslim groups for a cartoon that commented on the murder of foreign tourists in Luxor, Egypt.

In it, he depicted a dog labelled "Islamic extremism" with the caption, "With apologies to dogs everywhere." Mosher refused to apologize at the time. He said there would be no apology for the Harper drawing either.

Such illustrations are part of a robust culture of critiquing politicians, something Israelis are particularly good at, Mosher said.

He has met Israeli editorial cartoonists, including one of the country's most famous, Nissim "Nusko" Hezkiyahu, who is director of the Animix Cartoon Festival. Mosher said he hopes that one day he'll be invited to Israel to present his work, which examines Canada through the eyes of a cartoonist.

Dalhousie, BGU to create ocean studies centre

Joel Jacobson
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Halifax's Dalhousie University and Ben-Gurion University of the Negev (BGU) in Israel have signed a memorandum of understanding to create a world-class ocean studies centre in Eilat.

Dalhousie president Richard Florizone and BGU president Rivka Carmi signed the agreement Jan. 21 in Israel with the goal of combining the two schools' oceans scholarship and expertise. Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu attended the signing during Harper's visit to the Middle East.

The agreement allows for several different facets of inter-university collaboration, including pure and applied joint research projects, co-supervision of doctoral students, industry research internships in both countries, joint field courses (in the winter in Eilat, where BGU has a campus, and in the summer in Halifax), co-taught courses and major scientific conferences and workshops.

The end objective is to create an ocean studies centre in Eilat that encompasses scientific and academic programs from both countries.

Florizone, just starting his term as Dalhousie president after replacing Tom Traves who retired last October, remarked. "The excellent science done by Marlon Lewis and other Dal ocean researchers, together with [businessman and philanthropist] Seymour Schulich's strong support and [Dalhousie vice-president of research] Martha Crago's facilitation, has given great momentum and credibility to our partnerships with leading Israeli universities and research institutions."

Carmi was excited about the agreement. "The sea covers 70 per cent of the earth's surface and is essential for our survival. And yet, at the same time, most of it remains unexplored – filled with mystery and unfulfilled potential. We believe this partnership will strengthen the cutting edge science at both universities and place this unique initiative at the forefront of global research."

Carmi was one of the eight university leaders in attendance during Florizone's installation ceremonies in October. She received an honorary degree from Dalhousie and took part in an international panel discussion.

However, the start of Dalhousie's relationship with the university and oceans research in Eilat dates back to a 2011 Nova Scotia trade mission in which Crago took park.

"My visit that year gave me the awareness and commitment to build ties with the excellent scientific work in the unique setting of Eilat," said Crago. "It's a place that's important not only for marine science, but also for developing improved cultural and socio-political understanding.

"Dalhousie, with its striking multidisciplinary strengths in ocean science partnered with the oceanographic, marine biology and aquaculture possibilities of the scientists in Eilat, will advance our understanding of the resources and risks that the global ocean offers to us."

Helping make the agreement possible is Canadian philanthropist and Dalhousie School of Law namesake Schulich, who is playing a leading role in the new centre.

"I believe we have a duty to give back, and I cannot think of a better way to give back than to invest in education," said Schulich. "This partnership with Dalhousie University and Ben-Gurion University focused on ocean studies is important to our two countries and to our world. I am very proud to be a part of it."

In addition, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has been a valuable ally in support of the initiative, having partnered with the Eilat region for more than 30 years, and sees the expansion of BGU's Eilat campus a key part of its strategy.

Nestled on the coast of the Red Sea, Eilat is a logical location for such an oceans centre. The city is home to the Interuniversity Institute in Marine Science, which involves Bar-Ilan University, Hebrew University, Haifa University, Israel Institute of Technology (Technion), Tel-Aviv University and the Weizmann Institute of Science. Eilat also hosts the National Center for Mariculture, as well as a campus of BGU.

Dalhousie is a compelling partner for Eilat, with its long track record as one of the world's leading research universities through its work with initiatives ranging from the Ocean Tracking Network to the Halifax Marine Research Institute to the new, cutting-edge Ocean Sciences Building.

Kenney counts costs of supporting Israel

David Horovitz
The Times of Israel

Employment and Social Development Minister Jason Kenney, was one of the senior members of the large delegation accompanying Prime Minister Stephen Harper on his visit to Israel, the West Bank and Jordan last week.

Kenney sat down on Jan. 21 with The Times of Israel and discussed the striking contrast between Canada's stirringly pro-Israel public position, as underlined by Harper's "Through fire and water, Canada will stand with you" speech in the Knesset Jan. 20, and what might be summed up as the "Through fire and water, we'll condemn you" stance of so much of the rest of the international community. Excerpts:

TOI: In light of Harper's very supportive speech, many Israelis think he was spot on, and that the rest of the world doesn't get it. Why is there a gulf between Canada and very few other countries on the one side, and the rest of the world on the other, where Israel is concerned?

Kenney: Partly because as our prime minister said, "it's always easier to go along to get along" – that is to say, [to follow] the path of least resistance.

It's no secret that the foreign ministries of most western countries have an institutional bias against Israel that is probably informed by the fact that there is one Jewish state and dozens of other Islamic and Arabic states. That frankly informs the professional public service in most western foreign ministries.

You mean there are 20 times as many diplomats who have served in Arab countries?

And 40 times more in Muslim countries. That's right. The prime minister more or less intimated that in his speech. That means you've got dozens more diplomats and foreign policy wonks who absorb a particular perspective which is frankly and obviously hostile to Israel.

So that becomes the default position. It takes a profound act, it takes great intentionality on the part of political actors, to overcome that kind of institutional bias to begin with.

Secondly, the political incentives are not in favour of this. In the United States, of course, with a large constituency of Christian Zionists, and the not insignificant influence of the Jewish community, there's always been a strong political constituency generally to support Israel, but that doesn't exist in Western Europe, and it doesn't exist in Canada.

The Jewish community constitutes one per cent of our population at most, and there's no Christian Zionist constituency to speak of. For most people, if they're not familiar with the complicated politics and history of the region, they don't understand why a government would want to take clear positions on this.

So you've got an institutional bias built into most western foreign ministries, you've got a lack of political incentives to take these positions. I think that helps to explain it.

Those are the only two factors, or would you bring other factors into the mix? Is anti-Semitism in there somewhere, if not the dominant feature? Demographics – the fact that, for instance, there are 10 times as many Muslims as Jews in France? That hardly encourages a French MP, say, to take a fair-minded position on Israel and the region.

The positions that we have taken have been demonstrably against our electoral advantage. Some of the superannuated foreign policy establishment in Canada have grasped for an explanation as to why our government has taken these arguably contentious positions. And the simplest explanation they can come up with, which is really the dumbest, is that the Conservative party has taken this position to advance our electoral interests. Nothing could be further from the truth. The truth is this: with the Jewish community representing less than one per cent of our population, it tends to be concentrated in urban core electoral districts which have typically been inaccessible to the Conservative party.

On anti-Semitism, one thing that's not recognized here perhaps is that in addition to the positions we've taken on Israel and the politics of the Middle East, we've also become a global leader in combating anti-Semitism and promoting Holocaust commemoration, education and research. This year, Canada's chairing the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance. We hosted the last meeting of the inter-parliamentary coalition for combating anti-Semitism. That led to the Ottawa protocol, that essentially said that not all criticism of Israel is anti-Semitic, but those who tend to single out Israel for opprobrium or condemnation or question the legitimacy of the Jewish state are arguably giving expression to hateful views.

Are you impacting other nations' attitudes to Israel?

Yes, very much so. For example, in February-March 2007, I announced in my capacity as minister for multiculturalism that Canada would not participate in the Durban II [UN anti-racism] conference. We were by far the first country in the world to make that announcement, well before Israel. We did that because of our assessment that Durban II would be a rerun of Durban I. Iran was the vice-chair of the organizing committee. They were organizing preparatory meetings on Jewish High Holidays, presumably to minimize the participation of Jewish NGOs. All of the hallmarks were there. This was going to be a reiteration of Durban I.

So we announced our withdrawal, and suddenly put other western governments a bit on the defensive. The easier thing for them would have been to participate in the preparatory work and make a decision closer to the date. But because we made that decision very early in the process, over a year before Durban II, and again on Durban III, we set a benchmark.

So it's really that opportunity to change the frame of reference a little. We've done that on a number of issues. We were the first country in the world to stop funding the Palestinian Authority following the election of Hamas in March 2006. When Canada does something like that first, suddenly it at least changes the frame of reference. And I think there's a number of issues where that's happened.

Is the $66 million in funding for the PA announced by Harper earmarked specifically? How do you ensure it doesn't go to the wrong purposes?

Through close oversight. We have a robust office in Ramallah that administers these contribution agreements with the Palestinian Authority. Institution building is the primary focus. But also economic development, some humanitarian relief, including food aid. We have had a particular impact on police training there, which by all accounts has been quite successful. The Israeli government concedes that there's been tremendous co-operation on the security front with the authorities in the PA and a reduction in the levels of violence.

We're not naive. We understand that we'll always have to be mindful that the dollars are properly spent. But we want to play a constructive role here. And that's evidence that our position is not unbalanced. We strongly support a Palestinian leadership that's interested in pursuing peace. And we want to do so practically.

We also play an important role in the Palestinian refugee issue. Should there be traction in the peace process, we would be taking the lead on the resolution of the refugee issues. We stand ready, always, to provide our expertise on these issues.

There's a concern in Israel that the UN definition of Palestinian refugees, uniquely, includes third- and fourth-generation descendants, which elevates the numbers to the millions, and makes the problem that much harder to solve. If the same criteria were used as elsewhere, it might be easier to resolve.

I think that objectively speaking that observation is fair. I note with particular interest that if the same definition were applied de facto to the Jewish refugees of the Middle East then most of the Sephardim in Israel would be considered refugees.

Does Canada have a take on the Iran interim deal? Netanyahu thinks it's a mistake and it's not going to stop them. Your prime minister did not rule out that the diplomacy might go somewhere.

We certainly hope it does. And we support the efforts to achieve that objective. But we're not naive. We're openly skeptical of this Iranian regime.

Our skepticism isn't informed only by their nuclear ambitions, but also by their atrocious human rights record. Canada has led in each of the last seven years the UN General Assembly [UNGA] resolution condemning Iran's human rights practices, which has never been a slam dunk, by the way. A lot of the nonaligned countries line up with Iran in opposing that. We want to see progress from this new leadership not just on the nuclear program but more broadly on political reform and respect for rights. We're watching with a very skeptical eye. Should they prove their good faith through verifiable action, we'll relax our sanctions regime.

And yet at the General Assembly on Palestinian statehood, none of those Western European countries (except the Czech Republic) lined up with Canada and Israel and the United States. That doesn't suggest that people with the mindset the Canadian government is following are holding any kind of sway here.

We don't win them all, but we win some of them.

That 2006 trip to the G8 in St. Petersburg during the Lebanon conflict, there was an initial resolution drafted...that used the typical language of condemnation of Israel and Prime Minister Harper simply refused [to accept it]. He ended up largely drafting a revised G8 statement which was ultimately published, placing all of the responsibility for the Lebanon conflict on Hezbollah as the aggressor. That doesn't change the world. But it at least lights a candle in the darkness.

"It's no problem bringing half a dozen ministers, 15 MPs," but Harper should have considered "bringing, say, two MPs from the other parties," said Cotler, who was in Israel during Harper's visit but not part of the prime minister's entourage.

Cotler stressed that Harper's understanding of Israel and the Jewish People hasn't come at Palestinian expense.

"He has spoken of the Palestinians' right to an independent state," Cotler said, noting that the prime minister gave an additional $66 million in aid to the Palestinian Authority when he met with PA President Mahmoud Abbas in Ramallah.

While Canadian reporters may have waited in vain for Harper to criticize Israel publicly about settlements in the West Bank, Cotler believes it was sufficient to mention privately "what was necessary for each of the parties to hear."

Throughout the trip, the Canadian media hounded Harper over everything from the conservative makeup of the delegation and its large size to his "name-calling" in the Knesset when he invoked the term "anti-Semitism."

They also highlighted the embarrassing actions of York Centre MP Mark Adler, who was recorded shouting a request to a Harper aide for a picture with the prime minister in front of the Kotel, calling it "the million-dollar shot" that was key to his 2015 re-election prospects.

International media were also predictably critical of Harper's visit. Al Jazeera called his Knesset speech "baffling," while The Economist's blog seriously questioned "the rationale for the trip."

Not all Israeli reaction was positive, either. A cartoon in the English edition of Ha'aretz showed Harper and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu dancing together while a dejected Abbas looks on.

Most notably, two Arab Knesset members repeatedly shouted out catcalls before storming out of Harper's Knesset speech.

However, their main complaint – that MK Taleb Abu-Arar's village had no water and electricity – was revealed to be a lie when an Israeli watchdog group shared images of his house flanked by an air conditioner, satellite TV dish, electricity lines and an electric meter.

But most Israelis now agree with Netanyahu's characterization of Harper as a "rock star," a reputation he secured by singing and playing piano at a state dinner hosted in his honour by Netanyahu.

As for Harper himself, his main impression of Israel has been the "real shortness of the distances" in the Jewish state compared to the "elaborate transportation" needed to get from one part of Canada to another.

It's driven home Israel's perilous position and "how truly existential any security threat of any kind really is."

This "speaks to the extreme desirability of finding a peaceful resolution to some of the ongoing, unresolved issues," Harper said. "I remain convinced there is such a solution."

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, told The CJN that Harper's visit will increase Canada's standing not just in the eyes of Israelis, but also among Palestinians and Jordanians, as "a serious and committed player" in the Middle East.

On Jan. 22, Harper flew by helicopter to the Hula Valley in the Upper Galilee, to inaugurate the Hula Valley Stephen J. Harper Bird Sanctuary and Education Centre, a Jewish National Fund (JNF) project announced at the Negev Dinner in Toronto last month, where Harper was the evening's honoree and where he announced his Israel visit.

Harper and his wife, Laureen, examined a model of the soon-to-be-built 4,000-square-metre, high-tech visitor centre.

Harper eagerly agreed to lend his name to the project, saying, "I value it obviously as a personal recognition. I also think it is a fantastic environmental project."

In the 1950s, the Hula Valley was devastated ecologically when malaria-breeding swamps were cleared to create farmlands and several indigenous species were lost in the process. The agricultural land was always prone to flooding, however, and as ecological awareness grew in the 1990s, JNF led the way in restoring the native wetlands.

Each spring and fall, the area is temporarily home to close to 500 million birds migrating between Europe and Africa.

Ending his at-times controversial Israel trip with a project centred around ecology and the environment may have been a bid by Harper to broaden support for his activities here, or at least turn down the volume on the home-front criticism.

Following a ceremony in which he received an honorary doctorate from Tel Aviv University, Harper flew from Ben-Gurion Airport to Jordan, where he met with King Abdullah II and Prime Minister Abdullah Ensour. A spokesperson from the Prime Minister's office told The CJN that "obviously, it's been a very successful trip," noting that Harper was the first Canadian prime minister in history to address the Knesset, and adding that the prime minister's itinerary included both official duties and sites of personal significance, many of which are also important to Canada's Jewish community.

Knesset speech greeted with standing ovation

"I think he was intellectually honest on the origins of anti-Zionism in a way even Jewish community leaders are not," he said.

"There are very few world leaders who have as well thought-out a position," he said. And considering the criticism he faced for drawing too close to Israel, Nadler said, "I think it's a pretty gutsy thing to do. The prime minister has the courage of his convictions. They're well thought-out political positions, based on facts, and well articulated."

Nadler said the prime minister's forceful address seemed to catch even members of the Knesset off guard, with his address being greeted by standing ovations.

Later, Harper visited the Western Wall. "You should have seen the cheering at the Kotel. It was heartwarming. It was like he was being welcomed as a genuine political and moral hero, a person prepared to take positions that are unpopular," Nadler said.

Rabbi Philip Scheim, spiritual leader of Toronto's Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, said, "For all of us, the highlight was the appearance at the Knesset. The sense of pride we had of the prime minister standing up in the Knesset, giving as pro-Israel a speech as can be, from the heart…

"He knew he would get flack" from some opponents, he said, referring to critics who say Canada is best served with a more even-handed approach to the Middle East.

Rabbi Jarrod Grover of Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Toronto, called the trip a "wonderful moment after wonderful moment – with a lot of waiting in between."

Harper's Knesset speech, his welcome by Israeli parliamentarians were "very powerful moments," Rabbi Grover said.

He rejected suggestions that political leaders should be more even-handed. "Why be temporizing every comment of support for Israel with 'buts,' 'howevers'? That's singling out Israel unfairly for everything wrong in the country instead of celebrating the many things they got right in a region that is collapsing. That even-handed position did us no good. We should be proud the prime minister sees that."

For Vancouver lawyer Bernard Pinsky, Harper's visit marked "the conjunction of two things I love – my country Canada and the country of Israel.

"I don't see any conflict between loving and supporting them both. You can do both unconditionally. I want to be involved in making both places successful."

Pinsky, past chair of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver and past member of CIJA's board, among other community leadership roles, said there were several memorable events during the trip. Standing at the Kotel as the prime minister approached, he was surprised to see "a group of Chassidim… shouting and excited and frenzied with joy" to see Harper.

Rabbi Grover spoke of the benefit of spending time with his Jewish colleagues, as well as a few Christian ministers. "We spoke on the religious direction of the country and the challenges we face," he said.

"This was really not just about Harper and the trip to Israel. It was a bonding experience for people who accompanied him. The Jewish community should feel good that we have so many friends in the government and across the country," he added.

The one regret Rabbi Grover expressed was that "the visits were exclusive and secluded." Even the highway was cleared to ensure Harper's safety, he said.

"The prime minister saw the major sites, but he didn't really get to see Israel." Even taking him out for a coffee on Ben Yehuda, a pedestrian street in Jerusalem, would have exposed him "to the people, the culture, the real vibrancy of the country," he said.

Though some 200 individuals were part of the "accompanying party" that joined the official delegation, questions have been raised as to who made the list and who didn't.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation, one of Toronto's largest synagogues, was not among those invited on the trip.

He's not sure why. There has been some discussion in the community about the list. "Jews talk about all kinds of things. People talk, who is on, who was not on."

According to Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, Pinsky and Nadler, the Prime Minister's Office made the final list after soliciting suggestions from major Jewish organizations. MPs submitted their own lists.

Rabbi Grover said that's how he was included, noting he has developed a personal relationship with his shul's local MP, Chungsen Leung.

How the list was chosen is less significant than the trip itself, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl stated.

"What's really important is what the prime minister did there and what it represents, both to him personally and as head of government, and to us, as a statement on Canadian policy in the Middle East. So we have to keep our eyes on the big picture.

"I'm thrilled. I think this has been a home run for the prime minister and, more importantly, a home run for Canada," he added.

Israel competing on skates, skis

Jewish & Digital
Mark Mietklewicz

When you picture Israelis facing off against elite international competitors, you might think of sports such as judo or windsurfing or... chess. But how about figure skating or downhill skiing? That's what they'll be doing when the world's finest meet at the XXII Olympic Winter Games in Sochi next month.

Israel first sent a winter delegation (of one) to the 1994 Lillehammer Games in Norway, where skater Michael Shmerkin finished a respectable 16th. At Nagano, Japan in 1998, Shmerkin was joined by ice dancers Galit Chait and Sergei Sakhnovski. The pair would return to compete twice more, finishing as high as sixth in Salt Lake City in 2002. [bit.ly/isrolym41]

The Israeli contingent grew to five that year when Israel first competed in short track speedskating. In Turin, Italy, in 2006, Israel was first represented off the ice rink by alpine skier, Ukrainian oleh Mikail Renzhyn. [bit.ly/isrolym03] But once again, no medals.

The team was scaled back to three for Vancouver in 2010. Although figure skater Tamar Katz qualified according to Olympic standards, Israel's Olympic Committee wanted to put its weight behind athletes it thought had a greater chance of reaching the podium. So Katz was iced.

Boris Chait of Israel's Ice Skating Federation was not pleased. "We've been to countries where people come up and say: 'We didn't know you Israelis knew how to skate. We thought you only knew how to shoot.' ... Israel is not like Germany or the United States, where they can be choosy. They have hundreds of athletes, all capable of winning medals." [bit.ly/isrolym04] Despite the strategy, Israel was shut out again.

This year, Israel's contingent is back to five, all Olympic newcomers: alpine skier Virgile Vandeput, men's figure skater Alexei Bychenko, pairs Andrea Davidovich and Evgeni Krasnoposki, and short track speed skater, Vladislav Bykanov. [bit.ly/isrolym20]

Most of Israel's top winter athletes train in the United States. That can be controversial, but the competitors say they need to be there for the facilities and the coaching. "We may train in the U.S. most of the time, but we grew up in Metulla and we are proud to be Israeli," Roman Zaretsky told the Jerusalem Post in 2010. "We chose to skate with the music of Hava Nagila and Schindler's List for a reason. We want to make Israel proud and show the world that we are here." [bit.ly/isrolym15]

Although Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is joining other world leaders in giving these games a wide berth, Sochi is rolling out the welcome mat for Jewish visitors – well, at least Ari and Chani Edelkopf are. Rabbi Edelkopf is director of Sochi's Jewish community of 3,000. They run the local Chabad, which has been gearing up for the influx of Jewish tourists by renovating its shul and acquiring a new Torah scroll. [bit.ly/isrolym18]

Realistically, none of the Israeli athletes heading to Sochi is expected to come home with gold (or silver or bronze.) After all, it took 40 years of competition until Israel won silver and bronze at the 1992 summer games. And it wasn't until 2004 in Athens that Hatikwah was played as Gal Fridman was awarded gold for his incredible achievement in windsurfing. [bit.ly/isrolym19]

Hopefully, it won't take Israel's winter elite quite as long.

We must return to the middle path

Sephardi Window
Rabbi Ilan Acoca

In recent years, numerous articles and lectures have been given regarding the future of Sephardi Judaism.

As a Sephardi Rabbi, I was delighted. However, to my dismay, I found that most of the lectures were to the extreme right or the extreme left.

In my opinion, Sephardi Judaism has to come back to its origin, which was always the middle path.

Our great sage Maimonides, teaches us in his book Mishneh Torah: "Each and every man possesses many character traits. Each trait is very different and distant from the others.

"One type of man is wrathful; he is constantly angry. [In contrast,] there is the calm individual who is never moved to anger, or, if at all, he will be slightly angry, [perhaps once] during a period of several years.

"There is the prideful man and the one who is exceptionally humble. There is the man ruled by his appetites – he will never be satisfied from pursuing his desires; and [conversely], the very pure of heart, who does not desire even the little that the body needs.

"There is the greedy man, who cannot be satisfied with all the money in the world, as [Ecclesiastes 5:9] states: 'A lover of money never has his fill of money.' [In contrast,] there is the man who puts a check on himself; he is satisfied with even a little, which is not enough for his needs, and he does not bother to pursue and attain what he lacks.

"There is [the miser], who torments himself with hunger, gathering [his possessions] close to himself. Whenever he spends a penny of his own, he does so with great pain. [Conversely,] there is [the spendthrift,] who consciously wastes his entire fortune.

"All other traits follow the same pattern [of contrast]. For example: the overly elated and the depressed; the stingy and the freehanded; the cruel and the softhearted; the coward and the rash, and the like.

"The two extremes of each quality are not the proper and worthy path for one to follow or train himself in. And if a person finds his nature inclining towards one of them or if he has already accustomed himself in one of them, he must bring himself back to the good and upright path.

"The upright path is the middle path of all the qualities known to man. This is the path which is equally distant from the two extremes, not being too close to either side. Therefore the Sages instructed that a person measure (lit., estimate) his character traits, directing them in the middle path so he will be whole."

How I wish that the great minds of Sephardi Jewry would sit united and craft the future of Sephardi Jewry through Maimonides' model. This idea is appealing to me and it would be a dream come true.

I wish that this would happen soon, but for now, let us all implement the lesson of Maimonides and implement the middle path in all our endeavours.

A new look at day school funding

Class Act
Daniel Held

Last March, I described two parallel challenges facing Jewish day schools: financial sustainability and affordability. I wrote the article at the beginning of a research project studying the landscape of interventions designed to address the financial challenges facing Jewish day schools, day school parents and day school funders.

Nearly a year later, the project has resulted in a report published by the Jewish Funders Network, designed to share knowledge, spark conversation and ignite innovation in the work to make Jewish day schools both financially sustainable and affordable.

As I wrote then, day schools face two interrelated challenges. Sustainability is the long-term financial viability of the school – balancing its budget year after year and being able to withstand short- and long-term financial challenges including the steady demand for increased financial assistance and the need to invest in a quality educational program. Affordability is parents' perception of cost and value. It's a factor in both the perceived value and the cost of tuition in relation to a realistic assessment of household disposable income.

While the sticker shock of tuition can be startling, of greater long-term concern, is that average day school tuition across North America has risen at a steady rate of three per cent a year since 2009, a rate significantly higher than increases in household income and inflation.

Faced with the reality of these challenges, schools and communities across the United States and Canada have taken bold steps to reframe the revenue and expense sides of day school budgets. Roughly, these initiatives can be placed into five categories: controlling costs, determining and reaching capacity, communal collaboration, middle income initiatives and endowment building.

The creativity is impressive. School leaders are examining every aspect of their operations from admissions to fundraising, tuition to staffing. Among other initiatives, they are using technology to drive new models of teaching, setting tuition at a percentage of household income, sharing back offices and capitalizing on economies of scale, and building communal funds to offset the burden on parents.

Studying these initiatives, their benefits to day schools and the challenges in their implementation reveals that while many are worthwhile and have a marked impact on school budgets, none is a silver bullet. Significantly moving the needle in the costs and funding of day schools will require substantive changes both in the ways we deliver education and in the ways we fund the costs of this education.

Where does this leave us? While this prognosis could be seen as bleak, it's not. New, bold ideas are needed, but these innovations can only grow out of the substantive and creative work undertaken thus far. I am excited that the tenor of the conversation has moved from one lamenting the costs of day schools, to one proactively dreaming of and experimenting with innovative solutions. These collaborative and creative movements are a key first step toward moving the needle.

The intense, immersive nature of day schools make them the gold standard in Jewish education, increasing graduates' knowledge, shaping their identity and informing their future as communal leaders. But it is also this intensity that makes day school education expensive. We must continue to learn from the experience of the field and think collaborative and creatively.

Receiving in order to give

From the Bimah
Rabbi Yael Splansky

Kabbalah is the art and discipline of "receiving." The modern kabbalist Rabbi Yehuda Ashlag taught that there are four ways of giving and receiving.

The first way is "to receive in order to receive." This is what a baby does. This is what an egotist of any age does. Like baby birds with desperately open mouths larger than their bodies, there are times when we're so needy, nothing and no one else matters. The immediate and end goals are one and the same: to get.

The second way is "to give in order to receive." This is conventional morality. Most interactions between ordinary good people fall into this category. For example, I give my neighbour a Christmas present each year. The gesture of my gift is more and less than an expression of fondness. He's a very good neighbour, and I'd like to keep it that way. If I'm honest, I can see that the gift is a ritual for maintaining the relationship. Now when I go on vacation, he'll keep an eye on my house. Now when I let my weeds grow too tall in the spring, he'll resist complaint. "Giving in order to receive" makes the world livable.

The third way is "to give in order to give." This altruistic giving may be held up in other religious systems as the highest form of morality, but Rabbi Ashlag says it's actually not enough. "To give in order to give" is a kind of adolescent idealism that we ought to eventually pass through. In Judaism, the need to receive should not be denied or pretended away. It's essential if we are to live. Without receiving breath, food or a salary, we would not survive.

So what is the Jewish ideal? The highest, holiest way to interact with others is "to receive in order to give." I often hear mourners say how exhausting a shivah is. It's true, because "receiving in order to give" can be hard work. The task of the mourner during the seven long days of shivah is to wholeheartedly accept the care of others, to receive condolences and comfort, in order to grow strong enough to give again.

Once I travelled to Belarus with a group of doctors from my congregation to bring medical care and Judaica to the remnant Jewish communities there. We thought we would "give in order to give." We thought, at most, we'd receive the satisfaction that usually comes with generosity. But that wasn't all. We received an invitation of home hospitality.

The middle-aged couple who extended the invitation didn't have much. It didn't seem right for them to host all nine of us, but we knew we had no choice but to accept. We instinctively knew that it was the right thing to do. The dark street, the dark apartment building, the dark hallway eventually opened up to their warm and simple room. The feast they spread across every inch of their little table had been prepared with such graciousness. Our guilt for consuming more than a week of their salary faded when we saw the dignity and pride on their faces. In moments like this, it's hard to know who is the receiver and who is the giver. Both are grateful for the exchange. Both are uplifted by the compassionate negotiation.

We first learned this lesson at Sinai. We received God's Torah, so that we could devote our days and our generations giving, by way of mitzvot. When we place ourselves at the foot of God's mountain, we are likely to find our way back to the dignity and the power of receiving in order to give.

Actress defends SodaStream from criticism

Scarlett Johansson has signed on to become SodaStream's first global brand ambassador.

Scarlett Johansson addressed criticism from the Oxfam aid organization over her role as spokesperson for SodaStream, which operates a factory in the West Bank.

"I remain a supporter of economic cooperation and social interaction between a democratic Israel and Palestine," Johansson, a Jewish-American actress who serves Oxfam as a global ambassador, said in a statement released Jan. 25.

"SodaStream is a company that is not only committed to the environment but to building a bridge to peace between Israel and Palestine, supporting neighbours working alongside each other, receiving equal pay, equal benefits and equal rights.

"As part of my efforts as an ambassador for Oxfam, I have witnessed first-hand that progress is made when communities join together and work alongside one another," she said.

SodaStream, an Israeli firm that manufactures home soda makers, signed Johansson to be its first global brand ambassador. She is set to appear in a television ad for the company during the Super Bowl on Feb. 2.

The company employs Israeli and Palestinian workers at its factory in the Maale Adumim settlement.

Oxfam addressed Johansson's association with SodaStream in a statement on its website, saying "Oxfam is now considering the implications of her new statement and what it means for Ms. Johansson's role as an Oxfam global ambassador."

On Jan. 23, in a statement posted on its website, Oxfam wrote that it "believes that businesses that operate in settlements further the ongoing poverty and denial of rights of the Palestinian communities that we work to support."

Johansson has travelled to India, Sri Lanka and Kenya on behalf of Oxfam.

Her statement concludes, "Even though it is a side effect of representing SodaStream, I am happy that light is being shed on this issue in hopes that a greater number of voices will contribute to the conversation of a peaceful two-state solution in the near future."

Meanwhile, the Fox network, which is airing the Super Bowl, rejected SodaStream's commercial for the big game because it objected to a sultry Johansson saying at the end, "Sorry, Coke and Pepsi," USA Today reported.

Daniel Birnbaum, CEO of SodaStream, told USA Today that it had no choice but to drop the line, but complained to the newspaper that Fox rejected the Super Bowl commercial "because they're afraid of Coke and Pepsi."

CBS, which aired the Super Bowl last year, took a similar action against SodaStream's spot for that game.

Netanyahu slammed over settler comment

JTA

Benjamin Netanyahu

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu must refute his proposal that Jewish settlers should be allowed to remain in their homes in a Palestinian state, a member of the government coalition said.

Jewish Home leader Naftali Bennett, who serves as economy minister in Netanyahu's government, on Sunday called the idea "very dangerous" and said it "reflects an irrationality of values."

The Prime Minister's Office on Sunday told foreign news agencies and the Times of Israel that Netanyahu will not force settlers to leave a Palestinian state, even under a permanent peace deal.

The statement, clarifying remarks that Netanyahu made two days earlier in Davos, Switzerland, said Netanyahu believes there can be a Jewish minority in the Palestinian state, just as there is an Arab minority in the Jewish state.

Bennett in a statement also published on his Facebook page said, "We did not return to the Land of Israel after 2,000 years of longing to live under the government of [Palestinian Authority President] Mahmoud Abbas. Whoever advocates for the idea of Jewish life in Israel under Palestinian rule is undermining our ability to sit in Tel Aviv."

In Davos, following a meeting with U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry on the sidelines of the Economic Forum, Netanyahu said, "I do not intend to evacuate any settlements or uproot a single Israeli."

Netanyahu and Kerry reportedly met three times in Davos. In his address to the forum, Kerry said he will soon present a framework agreement for the negotiations "that will define the end game and all the core issues, and provide guidelines for the negotiators in their efforts to achieve a final-status peace agreement."

France to return looted paintings

JTA

French government-owned museums will return three paintings that they came to possess after the Nazis stole them from Jews during the Holocaust, France's minister for culture said.

Aurelie Filippetti identified the three paintings as Paysage Montagneux by the Dutch 17th century painter Joos de Momper; a painting of the Madonna and Child, and another unidentified oil portrait of a women. Two of the paintings were in possession of the Louvre Museum, and a third was found at the Museum of Dijon, according to the BFM TV television channel.

"I will return them very shortly to the legal beneficiaries of their owners at the time of their dispossession," Filippetti reportedly said on Jan. 21. She did not reveal the identity of the beneficiaries, but the Le Figaro daily reported they were Jewish.

The paintings are part of a list of 2,000 objects of art flagged as stolen by the Nazis that are in the possession of French cultural institutions, according to a report on the France3 television network. In 2013, French authorities returned seven artworks to descendants of Jews who had lost the objects during the Holocaust.

Fatah calls for 'co-ordinated' armed resistance

Elhanan Miller
The Times of Israel

Negotiations with Israel will lead to "zero results" if not fortified by armed resistance, a senior Fatah official said, adding that the first signs of a new Palestinian uprising have already begun to appear on the ground.

An American framework agreement expected to be presented in the coming weeks to the negotiating teams will never receive Palestinian endorsement if based on parameters currently being voiced by the Americans, said Tawfiq Tirawi, a member of Fatah's Central Committee and head of the official Palestinian investigation committee into the death of former PA president Yasser Arafat, speaking to Lebanese news channel Al-Mayadeen Jan. 23.

"We [in Fatah] know what the Israelis and Americans are suggesting [in the negotiating room]. So far, the negotiations are taking place only with the Americans, not the Israelis, and the Americans are liars. There is no framework agreement. It's a lie. Even if Kerry [presents] an agreement, Palestinians will reject it. There will be a vote, either inside Fatah or among the Palestinian leadership, and the American proposals will be rejected," Tirawi said.

A number of senior Palestinian officials have voiced public skepticism regarding the possibility of negotiations with Israel leading to a deal, as the nine-month time frame for talks approaches its end in April. Last month, PLO official Yasser Abed Rabbo blasted U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry for "breaking a promise" to end negotiations on all core issues during the original framework.

But Tirawi voiced skepticism that negotiations alone could ever produce a Palestinian state.

"There is no possibility of a Palestinian state being established on the West Bank and Gaza in the coming 20 years. None at all. Anyone who believes otherwise is wrong. Negotiations will bring us nothing... we, all Palestinian factions, must return to the cycle of action. When we will do this, many things will change."

Asked what he meant by the cycle of action, Tirawi clarified he was speaking of "resistance in all of its forms."

"Steadfastness is also resistance, negotiations are also a form of resistance, but there must be something on the ground as well... weapons, popular resistance, there are 100 methods to resist."

Palestinians were pushed into negotiations with Israel by a consensus of Western and Arab states which insisted on diplomacy, leaving the Palestinian leadership no option but to agree, Tirawi said.

"It's true that most PLO factions were against [entering negotiations], but there's something called Palestinian national interests. Did we compromise on any of our principles? No. That's what is important."

Tirawi's words were tacitly directed at PA President Mahmoud Abbas, who consistently speaks out against armed violence toward Israel, preferring to focus efforts on "popular resistance," namely boycotts, demonstrations, and limited violence such as stone throwing.

The resumption of armed resistance, Tirawi argued, must be done in an organized and co-ordinated manner, not sporadically.

'Second-timers' now eligible for Birthright

JTA

JERUSALEM — Jewish young adults who have previously visited Israel on a high school program will still be eligible for Birthright.

The Taglit-Birthright Israel steering committee approved the expansion of the free 10-day trip to Israel at a meeting earlier this month, the Diaspora Affairs Ministry announced. The expansion is to go into effect with this summer's trips for 18- to 26-year-olds.

The committee also voted to increase funding to attract more French young adults, who face escalating anti-Semitism at home, to the program. French aliyah has nearly doubled in recent years.

The decision to offer a Birthright trip for second-timers comes after operators of high school programs in Israel complained that the heavily subsidized Birthright trips have hurt enrolment in their programs, according to reports. The trips of the second-timers will be funded solely by donors, as opposed to first-time visitors to Israel, whose trip is one-third funded by the Israeli government.

"Taglit has proven itself as a leader in strengthening Jewish identity among young people in the Diaspora and building ties with the State of Israel," the Diaspora Affairs Ministry said in a statement. "Expanding the participation criteria will add to Taglit's positive influence in the Jewish world."

Ex-envoy to speak at UJA event

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Michael Oren, the former Israeli ambassador to the United States, will be in Toronto Feb. 4 as part of the closing celebration of UJA's 2014 annual campaign. His address that night: "Jewish peoplehood and the meaning of it today."

"A lot will be based on my personal experience, how my personal story is inextricably tied up with the story of the Jewish People and how I was inspired by that story," he said in a telephone interview from Israel.

"All of us are inextricably linked to that story."

Oren's personal narrative is quite a story. He was born to a Conservative Jewish family in upstate New York. The son of a U.S. World War II veteran who fought in Normandy and the Battle of the Bulge, he would go on to become one the staunchest defenders of the state of Israel. Oren moved to the Jewish state in 1979, served in the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) and authored several well-received books on Israeli history.

In 2009, he gave up his American citizenship to become Israel's ambassador to the United States. He relinquished that post in September 2013 and recently signed on with CNN as a contributor. He splits his time between Israel, where he lectures at the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya and the United States, where he is a fellow at the Atlantic Council, a think-tank.

In a wide-ranging interview, Oren lauded Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper, who recently concluded a visit to Israel.

"I think it strengthens Canada's position internationally," he said of the trip and of the government's steadfast support for Israel. "The fact it is standing up for what it believes in – for fair treatment of the Jewish state – I think it reflects well on the international stage.

"I think Canada has tremendous prestige in the world, and when Canada takes a principled position, countries listen."

Michael Oren

Of course more than one party backs Israel. "It is important that the support for Israel is bipartisan, even tripartisan," he said, adding he's had "an outstanding experience working with Canadian leaders on all sides of the aisle."

As for the United States, "the Obama administration is trying to make the best of a complex and volatile region… I think there have been some successes. We're living through a period of profound turbulence in the Middle East."

So is this the best time for the United States to push for talks between Israel and the Palestinians?

"There is a school of thought that says because the situation in the Middle East is so fluid and flammable, it's no time to give up assets. Another school says there's so much chaos, let's try to endow one of our borders with stability where we can make an impact," he said.

Oren comes down on the side of those who see it as a propitious time to pursue the stability of one of Israel's borders. But, he cautioned, "we have to be cognizant of the… turmoil in the Middle East."

"I hope the Palestinians are ready for peace and that means accepting Israel as the nation state of the Jewish People," something their leadership has not yet done, he said.

Any peace deal will have to take account of Israel's security needs, which would include a "prolonged IDF presence along the future eastern border."

Iran continues to present Israel with a profound strategic threat, he continued. It's the world's largest state sponsor of terrorism and is fully involved in the bloody Syrian civil war. Its pursuit of nuclear weapons threatens Israel and will likely spur a regional arms race.

"Other countries will get those capabilities," Oren suggested, and there's no guarantee Iran wouldn't use nuclear weapons or pass them on to terrorist groups.

Iran's recent interim agreement with the P5 + 1 interlocutors does not compel it to dismantle its nuclear facilities or centrifuges. In fact, it leaves them intact and allows Iran to maintain its stockpile of refined uranium that could be quickly improved to weapons grade.

"I think Iran has reason to be satisfied with the deal." Israel believed sanctions should have been maintained, along with a credible military threat, Oren said.

Jewelry designer has a passion to create

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Artistic, detail-oriented, with great fashion sense, finger dexterity and visualization skills – these are some of the qualities that describe Natalie Waldman, founder and creative director of Natalie B Designs.

"I started my business 15 years ago. At that time, it was more of a hobby. I didn't set out with a business plan in place. I am an artist with a huge passion to create. That passion was showing up in my jewelry designs," Waldman said.

Waldman is a powerhouse who designs and operates the business's social media content while running the jewelry design business from her Toronto studio. Her exquisite pieces are showcased in several fashion magazines as well as in Toronto's most exclusive stores, and her market has expanded to include women worldwide.

"Back in the '90s, I saw a brooch on somebody and I really wanted to emulate it. I didn't know where to get the materials, so I began sourcing. When you really want to find something, you make it happen," Waldman said.

Beginning with a line of one-of-a-kind brooches, she eventually expanded Natalie B Designs to include a full line of one-of-a-kind fashion jewelry inputting her own distinct personality on each signature piece.

Waldman's jewelry includes necklaces, bracelets, earrings, belt buckles and brooches. Her creations are made from the finest materials – 22-kt. gold, sterling silver, Swarovski crystals, semi-precious stones and other fine materials.

Travelling the globe, Waldman attends gem and bead shows to buy the components that go into her unique pieces.

"I have a clientele in Florida and do shows once a year that last over a three-day period. I will make over 200 pieces by hand, display and sell them, all while building up my clientele," said Waldman.

With two distinct lines showcasing her creations, a customer can choose either a one-of-a-kind design or a piece that has been duplicated.

"In my one-of-a-kind line that's beaded, I will make that in my studio by hand with pendants. The duplicated pieces are designed by me and will be sent out to be soldered and plated, and then returned back to my studio where I put in the stones. That piece can be made in any quantity that I choose.

"Some customers request custom-made pieces to co-ordinate with a particular outfit or for a special occasion. I will often take someone's old necklace that she may not know what to do with anymore and I will recycle that necklace and turn it into something she can wear again," Waldman said.

Taking inspiration from vintage designer Larry Verba, Waldman found that she has filled a niche with her brooches. "My brooches look great on sweaters and wraps, are made in 3D and are conversation pieces."

Natalie B Designs advertises mainly through social media and by word of mouth, selling Waldman's pieces all over the world through her website. They're promoted as "passionately handmade in Canada." The website showcases Natalie B Designs' full line of jewelry with creations such as her Juno Ring, Nova Spike Bracelet and Cecilia 22-kt. gold earrings with Swarovski crystals and glass cabochon.

Tessanne Chin, winner of NBC TV's The Voice, wore Natalie B Designs' Sophia Cuff, Grace Earrings and Amour Gold Cuff.

"The Voice contacted me through my website requesting select pieces of jewelry for Tessanne Chin, to be worn while [she was] performing on the show," Waldman told The CJN with pride.

The passion to create and the jewelry's unique detailing separates Natalie B Designs from its competitors. The jewelry line has a price-point ranging from $45 to $600 and is described by Waldman as "quality, rich and luxe pieces that are unique."

"I will continue to grow and build my brand," she said. "I have a responsibility to give back to the community, and one of the ways I can do that is through my jewelry."

Waldman has donated several of her pieces over the years to initiatives such as the Baycrest golf tournaments and other charitable causes.

She designed hand-blown heart key chains and donated them to State of Israel Bonds, which handed them out as gifts at events. "If people are receiving my pieces and it goes to a great cause, everyone is happy," she said.

Presenting the British Philip Roth

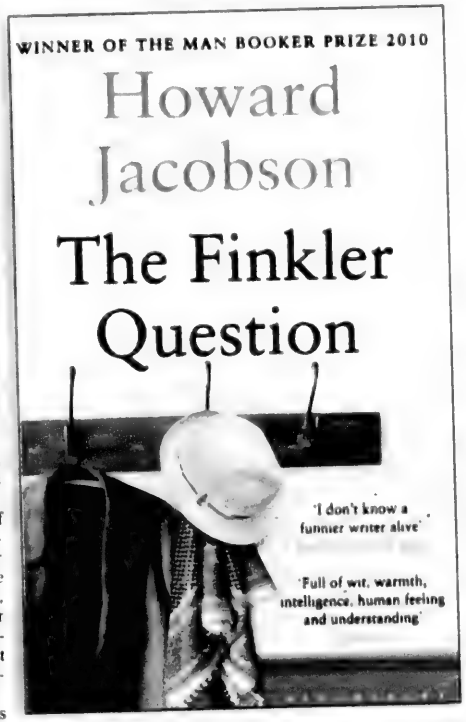
The Finkler Question
Howard Jacobson
Bloomsbury Publishing

While I generally review books of Jewish scholarship, this month let me introduce you to a work of fiction, The Finkler Question, by Howard Jacobson. Jacobson has sometimes been called the British Philip Roth, although he claims that he would prefer to be thought of as the Jewish Jane Austen.

The Finkler Question won the prestigious Man Booker Prize in 2010, awarded to a work of contemporary fiction by a writer from the British Commonwealth and Ireland. The book is an entertaining read, an unusual combination of humour and serious writing, and it has something to say about a burning issue in the Jewish community.

The plot centres around three characters: two Jewish widowers and one non-Jewish middle-aged bachelor friend of theirs who is a Jewish wannabe. As is often the case with modern-day fiction, none of these men is particularly attractive. (The major women characters in the book are more pleasant, but they play smaller roles.) And yet Jacobson makes us care about them despite their weaknesses.



WINNER OF THE MAN BOOKER PRIZE 2010
Howard Jacobson
The Finkler Question
'I don't know a funnier writer alive'
'Full of wit, warmth, intelligence, human feeling and understanding'

The main character is the gentile, Julian Treslove. He is fascinated and bedazzled by his old classmate, Sam Finkler, the least savoury but most successful and famous of the trio. For Treslove, "Finkler" becomes a synonym for "Jewish," and he dedicates much time and energy to figuring out what makes "Finklers" as successful and witty as they are.

Much of the book centres on sexual infidelity and insecurities about a partner's sexual fidelity. I found that aspect of the book tedious, and not particularly insightful.

But what really interests me is what Jacobson has to say about a different set of topics: Judaism, Zionism and anti-Zionism.

Sam Finkler, a philosopher who writes books for the general public, is a leader of "ASHamed Jews," a group of Jews who trumpet their embarrassment at the alleged crimes of the State of Israel. (The significance of the upper case ASH in the name "ASHamed Jews" is never clearly explained in the book.) Finkler is the most famous and respected of the ASHamed Jews and their most eloquent spokesman. He seizes any opportunity, even when he is asked to appear on a television program about music, to castigate the State of Israel.

Finkler gradually becomes disillusioned with the ASHamed Jews, especially when the group starts to advocate boycotting Israeli products and Israeli academics. A series of anti-Semitic incidents that take place in England have some influence on Finkler, too. (The events are fictional, of course, in this work of fiction, but are fairly similar to real live ones.) His thought processes and slow maturation are described in an understated but convincing manner. For example, when Finkler first hears about the boycott, he declares (as many people of conscience have): "I am in principle against anything which denies dialogue or trade, but to bar communication between intellectuals, who are always our best hope of peace, is self-defeating and inane."

Finkler also advances a few arguments that I have not heard. As he looks around at his group of fellow ASHamed Jews, he realizes that they have banded together because they see each other as family. Who, he wonders, boycotts his or her own family? As time goes on he also realizes that the group is fated to fail. Most of the members, he recognizes, including him, are actually very assimilated, not involved with any other Jewish causes and do not even like the idea of Jews seeing themselves as a separate social entity. He muses: "If I don't particularly want to be with Jews, what's the sense in being with these Jews, solely because they don't particularly want to be with Jews either?"

Toward the end of the book, Finkler has a further insight into the ironies of the radical Jewish left's criticism of Israel. He realizes that one of the Jewish values that's most strongly rejected by leftist Jewish critics of Israel is the idea that Jews are in any sense the chosen people. But then these same critics single out the State of Israel, criticizing it while ignoring egregious human rights violations of dozens of countries. In other words, these critics, who have turned the Jewish state into something special and demanded of it a higher standard of behaviour, are essentially treating the Jews as the chosen people.

In a recent interview in Ha'aretz, Jacobson says he believes that while anti-Semitism seems to be in remission, it has actually been transformed into anti-Zionism, which he sees as "retrospective guilt being deployed."

He adds: "While not every anti-Zionist is necessarily an anti-Semite, it would be surprising if every anti-Zionist wasn't an anti-Semite. After all, anti-Semitism today is such an unacceptable thing, there has to be a refuge for them... Anti-Zionism covers a multitude of sins. It deploys the same cruelty, heartlessness and favouring the letter of the law over sympathy and compassion."

At one point in the book, Finkler pessimistically notes, just after delivering an eloquent public speech defending Zionism, that few people actually listen to reason. "Humanity was trapped in conviction, like rats in rat traps. Those who saw as he saw, saw what he saw. Those who didn't didn't."

But Finkler himself grows in this book, breaks ranks with the anti-Zionist Jews, and, at the end of the book, even finds meaning in a traditional Jewish ritual.

With recent troubling anti-Israel motions at fringe academic organizations like the Association for American Studies, let us hope that more Finklers will see the light.

Canadian writer captures Israeli slice of life

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

Israeli-born Canadian writer Ayelet Tsabari, whose first book of short stories The Best Place on Earth was recently published by HarperCollins of Toronto, writes with amazing intensity, not only about modern Israelis, but also about the small Mizrachi ("Eastern") Jewish minority in Israel: her grandparents came from Yemen.

She's been lauded for crafting stories that pulse with vitality and are situated "on the intersections of love, hope and war." The CBC recently put her on its list of 10 up-and-coming "writers to watch."

Tsabari arrived in Canada at age 25. She lived in Vancouver 11 years and moved to Toronto four years ago. Married with a young daughter, she travels frequently to Israel where I contacted her by telephone, on the eve of a literary tour of Toronto (Feb. 2), Montreal (Feb. 5) and Ottawa (Feb. 6).

What are you trying to do when you write a short story?

I guess I just try to capture a slice of life. I try to inhabit the characters and let them lead me through the story. I try to not control it too much. It starts generally for me with some sort of scenario, a moment that often generates the voice. I don't exactly know what will happen, but I have snippets – I have a starting scenario, maybe a voice, maybe a couple of ideas, and then it sort of just comes together.

What was in your mind when you started to write* Tikkun, *the wonderful first story in the collection?

I knew that it happened during the intifadah. I knew that it was a love story, and I knew I would be telling it from the guy's point of view – he was the one who came to me first. But I didn't necessarily know it would end the way that it ended.

It was an amazing revelation to me to see that you'd actually written the story in a man's voice. You did it so well.

I love writing in alternate voices, it's one of my favourite things about fiction. I can't say that I choose in advance to write from a man's point of view or from a 68-year-old Yemeni grandmother's point of view. The creative process is not that calculated, at least not for me.

Your native tongue is Hebrew, but you now write beautifully in English. Was that a difficult transition for you?

Sure, at first. When I came to Canada, I was already a writer, and suddenly I was stripped of my tools. I couldn't write in English, not at that point; my grammar and my vocabulary needed improvement. It took a few years before I could even comprehend that it was possible to try.

Your literary tour is being hosted by the New Israel Fund, which is often strongly critical of Israel. What do you share in common with them?

What I appreciate about NIF Canada is its support for Mizrachi culture. Growing up in Israel, I was an avid reader, but I never found myself in literature. I never read books with Yemeni characters and I never read any Yemeni authors, and very few Mizrachi authors.

That made me feel as though my dream of becoming a writer was not very realistic because I had nobody to look up to. Secondly, I felt a little bit invisible because I didn't see myself in the literature. So one of the things I appreciate about NIF is their commitment to Mizrachi issues and Mizrachi communities in Israel.

A couple of your stories are set in Canada and another is set in the United States. Is there a common thread in your stories?

Mostly the stories – even the ones in Canada and the U.S. – involve Israeli characters. Also, I'm interested in people that are somewhat displaced. Thematically, that's probably one of the links in the stories, regardless of where they take place.

Ayelet Tsabari

What are you working on now?

I'm working on a novel, also centred around the Yemeni community. It seems I find endless inspiration in the Yemeni community, and I can't walk away from it.

This interview has been abbreviated and edited for clarity. Tsabari appears at the Gladstone Hotel, Sunday, Feb. 2, 7:30 p.m. To reserve a spot or for details about her other appearances, please visit www.ayelettsabari.com

Producer was 'hooked' on TV from childhood

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

Since she was a little girl, Phyllis Newman has believed she would one day be a television producer.

Newman, a creative media professional with more than 25 years experience in every area of media production last year became vice-president of production at Toronto-based Eggplant TV, which is responsible for the company's development and production for both film and TV for several Toronto specialty channels.

She has produced and developed many successful and highly rated Canadian and international television and digital media shows.

"Phyllis has been a great resource for us as the company grows and expands its mandate," Terry Tompkins, Eggplant's executive producer, said. "Her knowledge of producing great television has fast-tracked us through a number of challenges.

"Her experience in the business makes us all better. She is really quite invaluable to Eggplant TV."

Newman's interest in production developed many years ago. "I was always creating and performing in plays and concerts with my friends," she said in an interview. "Our basement was like my own little theatre, complete with closets filled with clothes from different eras that I would use to transform into various characters.

"But TV was the ultimate aphrodisiac. I was hooked. I knew early on that I had to be part of this magical and creative world."

Her first taste of media came at CHRY Radio York, where she interviewed several directors including Canadian filmmaker David Cronenberg, and well-known musicians such as Long John Baldry.

"At York University, I learned everything from producing and directing to editing, and I found that this is my passion," she said, adding that she worked with film majors although she graduated with a BA in sociology.

"But I wanted more creative control and I was determined to be a producer. This, I soon realized, was going to take a lot of hard work, focus and tenacity to survive."

Phyllis Newman

Her first job was with casting director Anne Tait, casting films and TV productions and working with directors including Richard Safarian (Twilight Zone) and Paul Maslansky (Police Academy).

Climbing the production ladder, Newman worked on documentaries that dealt with historical and political issues and supervised video shorts at the Canadian Film Centre, a school for advanced training and production in film, television and new media, founded by Norman Jewison.

When cable TV exploded and numerous specialty channels were created, Newman worked on a variety of youth, pop, cultural, talk, comedy and hidden cameral shows. "I've done it all," she said.

She has interviewed and worked with Donny Osmond, Deepak Chopra, Erica Ehm and fashion, financial, food and other experts.

As she looked back on her career, she noted that she has produced and cast every type of host and expert, "including an elephant for a Bollywood-themed episode of Party Mamas and to make love connections on Love Trap."

Songwriter finally meets singer Rod Stewart

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Rod Stewart's hit song Rhythm of My Heart was written by Canadian songwriter Marc Jordan.

The song, from Stewart's album Vagabond Heart, was recorded in 1991, but the two singers didn't meet face-to-face for 22 years. On Dec.15, they finally met at Toronto's Air Canada Centre, where Stewart was performing.

"Rod Stewart changed my life. Meeting Rod was a wonderful closing of a circle for me," Jordan said.

Jordan has penned songs for some of music's biggest stars, including, besides Stewart, Diana Ross, Cher, Joe Cocker, Chicago, Bonnie Raitt, Bette Midler, Olivia Newton-John, Natalie Cole, The Manhattan Transfer and several more.

But it was the success of Rhythm of my Heart that really set the stage for Jordan to be able to continue with his love of songwriting. "Everybody has to have the big hit to stay in the game. He gave me that big hit, so I could be who I wanted to be," Jordan said.

"I got a call from [the president of [Stewart's label], and he told me in his British accent, 'Rod loves your tune,' and that Rod had said, 'I'll sing the song – I will do a great job. I love the song!'"

Jordan spoke on the phone with Stewart over the years but never actually met him in person.

"He was lovely, warm and inclusive. He had his whole band with him backstage and he introduced me. He was very funny – just lovely. When musicians get together we have our own language. We joked around – all sorts of inside stuff," Jordan said.

They also wanted to talk about Rhythm of my Heart. "I wanted to say thank you to Rod, and... he wanted to know what my inspiration was behind the song... and I told him.

"I wrote the song as a sort of folk song. It was an anti-war song about a soldier who goes to war and wonders. He is wondering whether all humanity is gone from the world. He wonders back home if people still fall in love and if love is alive somewhere back where he no longer is. He longs to be home to find some love again because, while he remembers love, where he is there is just carnage."

Jordan's songs have appeared on some 35 million records. His songs include Marina del Rey, Survival and Waiting for a Miracle. He has recorded 14 cds of his own songs and has won ASCAP, Juno, SOCAN and jazz and pop awards. He spends his time touring solo and as a member of Lunch At Allen's (with band members Murray McLauchlan, Ian Thomas and Cindy Church), and is working on a musical with his wife, singer-songwriter Amy Sky.

Earlier this fall, Jordan released his newest album, On a Perfect Day, co-written with producer Chris Bilton and recorded in both Nashville and Toronto.

HUSTLING and HELPING AND POP

Ilan Mester
Special to The CJN

When Robert Ostfield took over music and pop culture portal andPOP.com, it was a tiny operation run by a couple of ambitious university students. In fact, Ostfield himself had just graduated from Ryerson University's Ted Rogers School of Management when he became CEO of the company.

Today, andPOP is one of Canada's leading entertainment portals for teens and young adults. The site books exclusive interviews with some of the hottest names in the music industry – we're talking Lady Gaga, Justin Bieber, Selena Gomez, Jason Derulo and Ellie Goulding, among many others. What's even more impressive: the brand's videos have scored more than 21 million views on YouTube alone.

Ostfield, who now oversees multiple websites as managing director for Channel Zero Digital, whose parent company has owned andPOP since 2012, says his success couldn't have happened without two key ingredients: hustle and help.

"I think I've always been a little bit of a hustler and just a natural sales guy," he told The CJN. "And I've always admired sales people. You read profiles of successful entrepreneurs and get inspired, and of course you want to imitate that kind of success."

During his university years, Ostfield was a member of Jewish fraternity AEPi. That's how he met andPOP founder Michael Levine, who introduced him to the website and co-founder Adam Gonshor. Ostfield quickly became involved with the business side of the site, eventually taking it over once he graduated. The young entrepreneur made one very important change by adding more video content.

"I saw how I was consuming media and how at the time, going back 10 years ago, the world wasn't set up to address that need," he said. "So I just genuinely saw an opportunity and thought I could develop the expertise and the know-how in order to exploit that opportunity."

At that point, he was already getting access to celebrities. He thought: why not create video content instead of just written profiles? "There's value in the access, but if you can really produce everything into compelling video content, there's double the value or triple the value," he said.

The emphasis on videos made andPOP stand out at the time. "That's how we became an official YouTube partner very early on. It's that we had high-quality video content with celebrities."

The editorial approach also made the brand stick out from some of its larger competitors.

"Because we were online and because we were a small operation, we could do whatever we wanted," Ostfield said. "So we could ask a boy band about picking up girls and doing drugs and getting drunk. The MuchMusics, the Kiss 92.5s won't and can't talk about that. But we're online. We can do whatever we want."

The site continued to build its credibility by sealing partnerships that made the brand more valuable. Over the years, some of those partners have included AOL Canada, XM Radio, Yahoo Canada and even Esso.

"Really that made the record industry look at us as a major, legitimate player," Ostfield said. "So when they're creating their press schedule for Lady Gaga they say, 'Yeah we gotta do MuchMusic, we gotta do Kiss 92.5, but andPOP really gives us a wide distribution – we gotta be on there, too.'"

He said andPOP's easy-to-work-with team has made the site popular with publicists and music execs. He also attributes a good part of andPOP's success to the great mentors he's counted on, including Jordan Banks, managing director of Facebook Canada.

"The best thing he taught me was, 'Be nice to people on your way up because you'll meet them on your way down.'"

Banks, who's also Facebook's global head of vertical strategy, joined andPOP as an investor and board member in 2010. Later, Canadian Music Industry Hall of Fame member Gary Slaight also invested in the company. Ostfield singles out two other individuals as close advisers and friends: Google's Neil Shankman and entrepreneur Jamie Grossman. "If I've had success, a lot of that has to do with the fact that I've had a lot of help," he said.

The site expanded in 2011 by raising some money and acquiring ChartAttack.com. "The old Chart Attack would talk about Billy Talent and Nickelback," Ostfield said. "Our Chart Attack talks about Arcade Fire and Broken Social Scene – it's kind of that Queen Street West indie alternative crowd."

Just like with andPOP, Ostfield started putting an emphasis on video content with Chart Attack, and the site's popularity has since grown significantly. He also makes sure his staff, interns and contributors are all in the same age group as his audience (i.e., teens and 20-somethings).

"We think it's a mutually beneficial opportunity, because for one, they allow us to really be authentic and talk about the right things that our audience cares about," he said. "And at the same time, they're getting amazing opportunities running this brand... So we think it's a win-win."

In 2012, Channel Zero – the largest independent broadcaster in Canada – acquired a controlling interest in andPOP Inc. "Both parties recognized that there was an interesting marriage that could happen here and Channel Zero Digital was formed," Ostfield explained.

In his new role as managing director, Ostfield oversees all of Channel Zero's main digital properties, including CHCH.com. He continues to manage andPOP and Chart Attack, and he also represents Sony's Crackle.com brand in Canada.

Needless to say Ostfield's a busy guy, but he always makes time to help others.

"You get what you give and I'd like to try to help the next generation of entrepreneurs by giving them the same kind of support that I have received," he said.

After more than 10 years in the business, the entrepreneur is still living by his motto: hustle and help.

Potential French immigrants spooked by charter: brief

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Quebec's proposed values charter would have a "devastating" impact on the Jewish community, and is already dissuading Jewish immigrants, notably from France, from coming here, Federation CJA and its advocacy arm, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), say in a joint brief to the National Assembly committee conducting hearings on Bill 60.

"Since the beginning of this debate, a noxious social climate has developed and had a negative impact on the continuity of the Jewish community," the strongly worded brief states.

"Numerous French Jewish families tell us that they are now considering immigrating to other regions of North America instead of Quebec."

The charter jeopardizes the community's efforts for years to attract Jewish immigrants, notably from France, to offset the decline in its numbers since the 1970s, they say, as well as to find ways to keep its youth in the province.

"Now, the debate on the 'charter of Quebec values' has destabilized our young people, of whom greater and greater numbers ask themselves whether there is a place for them in Quebec," the 40-page brief states.

The organizations want the bill withdrawn, calling it "a bad solution to a problem that does not exist," one that violates the federal and Quebec human rights charters, as well as the United Nations' Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

The organization warns against Quebec modelling its brand of secularism on France's rigid separation of church and state, which has contributed to social tensions in that country.

"By importing to Quebec a model of secularism foreign to Quebec history, we risk importing with it social conflicts that until now have been absent from Quebec," the organizations state.

Since the Quiet Revolution a half-century ago, the province has developed a balance between the rights of the majority and minorities that works quite well, they say.

"[T]his bill threatens to betray the Quebec tradition of pluralism, to exclude the people of minority communities from full participation in public life, and to compromise the acquired rights and the future of the Jewish community in Quebec."

Rather than entrenching state religious neutrality, the charter represents "the antithesis of secularism," the organizations argue, by giving preference to the dominant Catholicism.

"It would confer an exceptional legal status, said to be a national heritage, for the traditional faith of the majority, and thus totally marginalize the public expression of minority faiths."

Susan Laxer

The organizations say they are in favour of "a pluralism that gives minorities the necessary space to express their distinctive characters while respecting French Canadian history and tradition," along the lines of the policy adopted by René Lévesque's Parti Québécois government in 1981.

Quebec vice-president Luciano Del Negro said CIJA hopes to receive a date to appear at the public hearings, which are scheduled to continue until April.

The federation and CIJA will hold a "town hall" meeting on the charter Feb. 10 at 7:30 p.m.

"We understand the frustration that has been felt throughout our community over the proposed charter," federation president Susan Laxer wrote in an e-mailed community message.

"[This] will be an important opportunity to hear a spectrum of insight as well as make your own voice heard."

B'nai Brith Canada has chosen not to make the text of its brief public, said Quebec region director Harvey Levine.

He said B'nai Brith does not want "to spill all the beans" in advance of its hoped-for appearance before the parliamentary committee.

The organization submitted its brief on Dec. 19, the day before the deadline, he said, and is in about 106th or 107th place to receive a date to be heard, which would likely mean the end of February or early March.

Basically, B'nai Brith believes the bill is unnecessary and should be rejected, calling its unconstitutional, Levine said.

"It's turning upside down the whole definition of a secular society," he said. "It's divisive and playing into the hands of xenophobia."

Meanwhile, the Quebec Liberal party issued its official position on Bill 60 on Jan. 21. It would place no restrictions on the wearing of overt religious symbols by public employees, except for police officers and prison guards who have uniforms.

Leader Philippe Couillard said the latter would have to make an accommodation request to a "competent authority" to wear such symbols, and that any religious gear must not impede security, communication or identification. "Real steps towards integration" would also have to be demonstrated by the applicant.

The sole Jewish Liberal MNA, Lawrence Bergman, defended the position as representing greater flexibility than exists at present for police and correctional officials who wishing to display religious symbols. He added that kippot would "certainly" not be prohibited, because they don't present safety or other issues.

Teen's legacy will roar on

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

The family of Olivia Sophie Wise is learning to move forward in life without their beloved daughter and sister.

At age 16, Olivia captured worldwide attention by recording her version of Katy Perry's Roar. The video became an overnight online sensation and drew the attention of Perry, who posted a response to Olivia saying she was "very moved" by the video and "Wise sounded great."

Olivia lost her battle with brain cancer in November 2013. Her courage and inspiration triggered an outpouring of compassion.

Following her death, Perry tweeted, "Your spirit and strength has inspired me and so many others... May you rest in peace."

Grief experts say losing a child is the worst kind of loss anyone could possibly go through, a searing and unspeakable pain, but her three siblings have also been experiencing the pain of her loss.

"I'm glad she's not suffering anymore. It's hard but it makes it easier knowing that I feel her with me all the time. I am focusing on all the fun and happy memories I have, and Olivia was, and will always be, my best friend," said Olivia's younger sister, Sabrina.

Her brother expressed it this way: "Sometimes I have trouble sleeping. I miss my sister so much," Jason said.

Older sister Kaily is also living with past memories. "I'm not doing so great," she said. "Just trying to get through each day and remembering all the positive memories we had together. I will never be able to fully accept that she's gone – it still feels like a dream but I know that every step I take in life, she will always be my side."

Michael Wise, Olivia's father, expressed his sorrow, but he, too, is clinging to the memories. "I have deep sadness in the pit of my stomach. Life does not feel the same. I hear her tell me in her own voice, 'I love you Daddy,' with the way she used to pucker and blow kisses to me," he reflected.

In the midst of their grief, Kari Winemaker, Olivia's mother reflected on the apparent injustice of the loss and the need to move on for her family.

"The loss of Olivia is so unfair to my whole family, and especially to Olivia, who had so much to offer. I am thanking God for my other three amazing children, who pick me up each day. I know they deserve to be able to carry on, so I feel I have to show them how. I am forcing myself to be the mother I was and the one I want to be. I am doing my best to get us all back to our schedules and to living life to the best of our abilities."

But it's not easy, she added. "Not a second goes by each day that I don't think of Olivia, her beauty, her zest for life, her wonderful spirit, and I use this to propel me forward. She is a huge part of me. I have learned so much from her. I feel her presence every day. I speak to her at times, to tell her how much I love her and to ask what she would do about certain things. I am trying to find purpose for this awful tragedy."

Olivia's dream was to help children, her mother said. "We started the Liv Wise Fund. My kids were selling Liv Wise bracelets at school raising money from early on. We have changed the name to the Liv Wise Foundation, raising money for brain cancer research and children living with brain cancer. We have raised over $200,000 and the numbers are continuing to rise."

Winemaker praised the Jewish community, which she said has been supportive from the time they heard of Olivia's illness. "We have received support from community members such as dropping off a challah, offering kind words, helping with car pool and if we need something, people are there, and we are thankful."

It's important to keep loved ones alive in our heart and in the hearts of other people as well, she said. "We talk about Liv, we go to places she enjoyed. We still buy the food she liked. We see something that reminds us of her. Every Sunday, we have family and friends for dinner, and we reminisce.

"Olivia loved her circle of friends, singing and performing in theatre productions. She made an impression anywhere she went – people fell in love with her everywhere," reflected Winemaker.

A fundraiser is being planned at the Toronto Zoo this spring, Winemaker said. "A run – Liv will roar again."

Olivia's versions of Roar and Simple Girl, an a cappella version of a song Olivia wrote when she was 11, are available on iTunes with the proceeds going to the LivWiseFoundation.

Halachic challenges of the ice storm

Kosher Living
Richard Rabkin

Who's ready for summer? This winter, the weather has been particularly harsh, and it's not even half over yet! I think Someone Above is trying to give us a hint – why don't we all just make aliyah already?

In all seriousness, while bad weather can be uncomfortable, and at times dangerous, it can pose halachic challenges as well. This was evidenced during the recent ice storm in Toronto.

An important kashrut principle that is not widely known is called bishul yisrael. Briefly, for food to be considered kosher, even if the ingredients are 100 per cent kosher, a person of Jewish faith must be symbolically involved in the act of cooking (as long as the food would be "fit for a king's table" and could not be eaten raw). Today, most COR caterers, restaurants, bakeries, supermarkets and so on have non-Jewish chefs and kitchen staff, so the COR mashgiach is required to light the initial flame that's used to prepare the food. This doesn't necessarily mean that the mashgiach needs to light every stovetop every morning. Rather, he or she lights the oven's pilot light, which is then used to ignite all of the other various flames on a day-to-day basis.

Most of the time, this system works well. But, if you can see where I'm going here, if there is a prolonged power outage, it can pose a significant problem. And if you certify approximately 170 retail establishments across the Greater Toronto Area as the Kashruth Council of Canada does, then you've got 170 times the problems. That's just what happened during the 2013 ice storm.

On Friday night, Dec. 20, freezing rain began to fall. By Saturday night, many homes, business and COR facilities began losing power. Starting Monday, and throughout the week, different sectors began regaining their power, so COR mashgichim had to be at the ready so that they could visit their establishments and relight pilot lights and assist in any other way possible.

City officials were recommending that non-essential personnel stay off the roads due to the dangerous conditions, but for kosher consumers, COR mashgichim are essential personnel! While some mashgichim couldn't even get their cars out of their driveways due to the ice, the COR team banded together and covered for one another, visiting the city's establishments one by one so Toronto could have kosher food.

Let's hear it for our boys (and girls)!

Some COR-certified facilities, such as retirement homes and hospitals have their own generators to restore power in cases of emergency. At one such seniors residence, the generator was able to keep the kitchen running, but the power didn't extend to the rest of the residence. The health and safety of the elderly residents is obviously critical, so they were evacuated to a hotel downtown. But many of the residents keep kosher. What were they going to eat?

The senior's residence staff decided to cook as much food as they could in their COR-certified facility, with their mashgiach assisting. Then, they double-wrapped all of the meals, sealed them with COR kosher stickers and loaded them into vans, which transported the meals to the hotel where the residents were staying. In spite of the treacherous road conditions, our COR mashgiach accompanied the van to the hotel and helped set up the satellite kitchen so that all of the residents' dietary needs were taken care of.

While power was restored to most of the city within a few days, the ice storm of 2013 seems to have left an indelible mark on our communal consciousness. For instance, trees that were downed in my neighbourhood have yet to be cleared. But as time moves on, hopefully we won't forget the heroic actions of a few COR mashgichim who kept the city of Toronto kosher in December 2013.

Fish – fast and fabulous

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN

We all know that we should be eating more fish. It's a lean protein, full of heart- and brain-healthy omega 3s and easy to digest. Also on the upside, fish is one of the easiest things to cook, if you follow a few guidelines.

All fish is naturally tender, so regardless of the type, it will cook in about 10 to 15 minutes, making it a fantastic weeknight option. There's no need to marinate it to make it tastier or to engage in a long slow cook to tenderize it. Basically, all fish cooks in the same amount of time, regardless of the cooking method. A good rule of thumb is to start testing it for doneness after 8 to 10 minutes per inch, always measured at the thickest width, not length. This applies whether you're poaching it, baking it or grilling it. That said, it's important to not overdo fish or it will dry out.

The other wonderful thing about fish is that it's so versatile. There are so many types to choose from that you'd be hard pressed to find yourself getting bored with fish. Even if you consume fish only once or twice a week, and regardless of what the recipe calls for, try to buy the freshest fish you can. If only frozen filets are available, thaw them in your fridge overnight and never at room temperature. The choices I have suggested in the recipes below are just that, recommendations only. Feel free to substitute your favourite variety.

GRILLED HALIBUT WITH SUGAR SNAP PEA AND LEMON MEDLEY

This fish is an all-season treat. Fresh herbs are available everywhere now and liven up this colourful topping. Halibut is a meaty fish and a bit on the expensive side, so this is a treat to be enjoyed once in a while. Having said that, it's super easy to put together and as delicious as they come.

2 cups sugar snap peas, trimmed (about 8 oz.)
3 green onions, thinly sliced
2/3 cup finely shaved or sliced fresh fennel
1/2 cup julienned sun-dried tomatoes, packed in oil
1 tsp. freshly grated lemon zest
5 tbsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice
5 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
2 tbsp. each chopped fresh parsley and chives
1 tbsp. chopped fresh tarragon
2 tsp. honey
1/2 tsp. each salt and pepper
halibut filets

Preheat the oven to 400. In a pot of lightly salted boiling water, blanch snow peas for 1 to 2 minutes or until bright green. Drain. Immediately rinse under cold running water until cool. Drain again. Cut in half on the diagonal and transfer to serving bowl. Stir in green onions, fennel, sun dried tomatoes and lemon zest.

Place fish filets on aluminum foil-lined baking sheet.

In a bowl, whisk together lemon juice, olive oil, parsley, chives, tarragon, honey and salt and pepper. Brush each filet with 1 tbsp. of the mixture. Roast in the centre of the preheated oven for 8 to 10 minutes, depending on the thickness of the fish, or until the fish flakes easily.

Meanwhile, toss together the remaining lemon/oil mixture with the sugar snap pea mixture. Transfer filets to plates and top with snow pea medley. Makes 4 servings.

THAI FISH CURRY

If you want to serve this as individual servings, then buy four filets. However, it's just as easy to make it a curry "stew" by using a meaty fish such as snapper and cutting the fish into large chunks before you poach it. This is excellent over Basmati or Thai Jasmine rice to help soak up the delicious sauce.

2 tbsp. canola oil
3 cloves garlic, minced
1 tbsp. finely minced fresh ginger
1/2 tsp. each hot chili flakes, ground coriander and ground cumin (or 2 tsp. Thai hot chili paste)
1/2 cup each diced sweet red pepper and carrots
3 cups sliced mushrooms
1 tbsp. each finely grated lemon and lime zest
1 cup light or regular coconut milk
2 tbsp. tomato paste
1/2 tsp. each salt and pepper
4 fish filets (such as cod, salmon or red snapper)
3 green onions, chopped
1/4 cup chopped fresh coriander

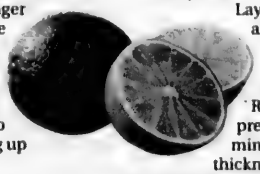
In a large shallow saucepan, heat oil over medium heat. Add garlic, ginger, chili flakes, coriander and cumin; cook, stirring, for 1 minute. Add red pepper and carrots and cook, stirring, for 3 minutes. Add mushrooms. Cook, stirring occasionally, for about 10 minutes or until all excess liquid has evaporated. Stir in lemon and lime zest, coconut milk, tomato paste and salt and pepper. Bring to a boil, stirring to break up the tomato paste.

Nestle fish in liquid. Reduce heat to low and simmer, covered, for 8 to 11 minutes, depending on the thickness of the fish, until the fish flakes easily. Remove fish to a serving platter and keep warm.

Boil remaining liquid for 3 to 5 minutes or until thickened. Remove from heat; stir in green onions and coriander. Pour over fish and serve immediately. Makes 4 servings.

OVEN-ROASTED FISH WITH WASABI, LIME AND GINGER SAUCE

This Asian-inspired recipe takes only minutes to prepare. The lime juice blends splendidly with the soy, ginger and coriander, while the wasabi powder adds a little kick. If you're not a fan of heat, feel free to leave it out. The addition of mayonnaise allows the sauce to nap the fish without ending up all over your plate.



4 tbsp. freshly squeezed lime juice
1 tbsp. soy sauce
2 tbsp. chopped fresh coriander
1 tbsp. finely minced fresh ginger
2 cloves garlic, finely minced
1/4 tsp. wasabi powder
1/4 tsp. freshly ground black pepper
4 sole filets (sea bass or snapper can be used)
2 tbsp. mayonnaise

Preheat the oven to 400. In a small bowl, whisk together the lime juice, soy sauce, fresh coriander, ginger, garlic, wasabi powder and pepper.

Lay the four fish filets on an aluminum foil-lined baking sheet. Brush 3 tbsp. of the lime juice mixture over the filets. Roast in the centre of the preheated oven for about 7 minutes, depending on the thickness of the fish, or until the fish flakes easily.

Meanwhile, whisk the mayonnaise into the remaining lime juice mixture.

Transfer fish to serving plates and drizzle with lime juice/mayonnaise mixture. Makes 4 servings.

Going for gold in Sochi

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Dylan Moscovitch knew he wanted to compete in the Olympics from the time he was a little kid.

"My mom said when I was five, someone asked me if I wanted to go to the Olympics, and I said, 'No, I want to win the Olympics.' It's been at the forefront of my mind my entire life," Moscovitch said.

Now, the Waterloo-based Toronto native is fulfilling that dream, having arrived in Russia to compete in the Sochi Olympic Winter Games with figure skating pairs partner Kirsten Moore-Towers.

He said he's going to use his past competition experiences as strength and fuel to bring himself to a whole new level. As the only Jewish figure skater on the Olympic team, and perhaps the only Jew competing for Canada, he'll be doing his best to win the competition that he called the "pinnacle goal" of figure skating.

"I'm definitely proud to be representing my country, Canada, and also to be representing Jewish Canadians," he said. "It's an honour to be representing the community, and I hope to make everyone proud."

Moscovitch, who began skating as a toddler, said he's been experiencing a big wave of emotions ever since he heard the news that he'd be competing.

"[It's] very exciting and surreal, a little overwhelming," he said. "It's been my dream. It's been what I've been working for my entire life, so to know all those hours and sacrifices and finances and time... it all came to fruition."

The team was fairly confident they would be chosen even before it was made official. They placed second in January at the national championships in Ottawa, and came in fourth overall at the 2013 world championships, which Moscovitch said is the highest level apart from the Olympics.

With the goal of getting to Sochi, the team has been on a rigorous training schedule, with skating practice six days a week and daily training both on and off the ice ranging from 3-1/2 to six hours a day.

Lev Tahor Raided

CHATHAM, Ont. — Quebec police searched two homes belonging to the fringe haredi sect Lev Tahor on Jan. 29. Last week's raids took place in Chatham, Ont., where some 40 sect families reside after leaving Montreal in November. The raid came days before an Ontario judge was set to decide whether 14 children ages several months to 16 years old, can remain with their parents in Chatham, or be placed in foster care in Quebec, where there is an outstanding order by child welfare services. The ruling was expected Feb. 3. Also last week, a mother from the group who had two of her children, both under five, removed for five days and returned, sent an open letter to media outlets decrying harassment by authorities. The children were removed when a mark identified by child welfare authorities as a bruise was noticed on one child's face. The mother of three, who can't be identified, says the mark was made by permanent marker. That case was adjourned until April.

Frank Exhibit Opens

VANCOUVER — A travelling exhibit about Anne Frank opened last week at the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre. The exhibit, from the Anne Frank House in Amsterdam, is aimed at schoolchildren. A companion exhibit includes artifacts donated by local Shoah survivors. Both are running until May 30.

YU Lawsuit Tossed

NEW YORK — A U.S. federal judge tossed out a $680-million sexual abuse lawsuit filed by 34 ex-students of Yeshiva University. The judge said the victims, ranging in age from late-30s to early-60s, waited too long to speak up in accusing YU of turning a blind eye to molestation they say they suffered there. Their lawyer called the ruling an "abomination and a disgrace" and plans to appeal. The suit, filed in July, alleges YU wilfully turned a blind eye while two of its rabbis sexually assaulted teens at YU's prestigious high school for boys in Manhattan from 1969 to 1989.

Anti-Hollande March Turns Ugly

PARIS — A march through Paris against French President Francois Hollande ended with anti-Semitic chants and support for an anti-Semitic comedian.

Protesters give Nazi salutes. [YouTube screenshot]

Some 150 protesters were arrested in the "Day of Anger" demonstrations Jan. 27. Nineteen police officers were injured in clashes with protesters, one seriously, AFP reported. Police estimated that 17,000 participated in the march.

Protesters performed Nazi salutes and the quenelle, a gesture invented by the anti-Semitic French comedian Dieudonné M'bala M'bala, that's reminiscent of a Nazi salute. They also urged freedom of speech for him.

Anti-Semitic chants included "Jews go home" and "Jews, France is not your country."

The Union of French Jewish Students, or UEJF, condemned "anti-Semitic slogans and Nazi salutes" by some protesters. The group's president, Sacha Reingewirtz, told AFP, "This Day of Anger has turned into a day of hate."

Reform Shul Defaced

JERUSALEM — A Reform synagogue in the central Israel city of Ra'anana was vandalized with graffiti. The graffiti, found Jan. 30 on the outside of the Kehilat Ra'anan synagogue building, included quotes from Maimonides on non-believers. The shul has previously been vandalized, most recently in April 2011.

Ottawa Facebook dispute echoes U.S. 'Open Hillel' debate

Where's the line in campus debates about Israel?

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

When Hillel Ottawa's Israel Awareness Committee (IAC) updated its Facebook page last month to include a social media code of conduct, Tyler Levitan noticed a clause that he says violates the committee's stated goal of "engaging in debate, discussion and dialogue on Israeli society, culture and politics."

Based on Hillel International's general operational guidelines for all its chapters, the code says the IAC will remove posts that endorse boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaigns against Israel, which it views as "hateful rhetoric."

But Levitan, national campaigns co-ordinator for Independent Jewish Voices, said the IAC policy stifles discussion by silencing people who disagree with Hillel's position on Israel.

His challenge echoes a debate going on south of the border, where a backlash against Hillel's chapter guidelines has spawned a growing "Open Hillel" movement.

Among other things, the guidelines contain a clause that says Hillel is open to partnering with organizations that have diverse perspectives in support of Israel, but won't partner with groups or host speakers that support BDS campaigns.

This past fall, Levitan started an organization called Young Jews for Social Justice, which, according to its Facebook page, is "made up of Jewish youth in Canada whose critical views of Israel's policies are marginalized and ignored by the mainstream Jewish community."

When Levitan tried to advertise the group's first event through Hillel in order to reach Jewish students, he found he wasn't welcome to do so.

"Hillel creates this atmosphere of not wanting critical discussion of Israel," said the Ottawa-based Levitan, who graduated from Carleton two years ago with a master's degree in political economy.

"It's a very simplistic, very dishonest way of categorizing the Palestinian solidarity movement. On Hillel's part, it's very irresponsible to their mandate of providing a space for diversity of Jewish opinions."

Raid bolsters Israeli claims about Turkish flotilla

An intriguing story from Turkey last month, although covered by two of the world's largest news agencies, AP and Reuters, received, with the exception of CTV, very little media attention in Canada.

On Jan. 14, Turkish anti-terrorist police raided the offices of the government-supported Humanitarian Relief Foundation (IHH) in the southern Turkish city of Kilis, which borders Syria. This is the same IHH that headed the Mavi Mamara flotilla's attempt in May 2010 to break Israel's naval blockade of Gaza, leading Israeli commandos to storm the ship. Nine Turks were killed in the ensuing clashes which, Israel claimed, were caused by IHH militants – not, as Turkey maintained, innocent humanitarians.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The Turkish police action last month was prompted by evidence that IHH, which claims to have been delivering "humanitarian" aid to rebel groups in Syria, was actually supplying arms to groups linked to Al Qaeda.

Reuters reported from Istanbul that "the rise of Al Qaeda-linked groups such as Jabhat al-Nusra and the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIL) in parts of northern Syria near the border has left Ankara open to accusations it is lending support to radical Islamists. Prime Minister Tayyip Erdogan has repeatedly denied Turkey is providing shelter or backing to Al Qaeda-linked groups in Syria."

According to Reuters, the operation against IHH was part of a series of raids carried out in six cities, including Istanbul, in which five people were arrested overall including two IHH employees. However, on the same day (Jan. 14), Hurriyet, a major Turkish newspaper, reported that the anti-Al Qaeda operation had netted 28 suspects.

An AP story from Ankara, carried on ctv.ca, examined some of the political intrigue behind the IHH story that's playing out as part of allegations of corruption against Erdogan and members of his party, the AKP: "The government says the corruption probe was instigated by followers of a moderate Islamic movement led by U.S.-based cleric Fethullah Gulen. The government insists that Gulen's supporters have infiltrated Turkey's police and judiciary and are out to discredit the government ahead of local elections in March. Gulen denies being behind the vast police corruption probe that has targeted people close to Erdogan."

IHH denies any links to Al Qaeda and terrorism and, in turn, charges that it's being targeted as a way to prevent Turkey's largest humanitarian organization from sending aid to Syria.

AP reported that IHH Secretary General Yasar Kutluay insisted that both Israel and Gulen's supporters were behind the police raid, a charge Gulen's movement immediately rejected as slanderous.

Mustafa Akyol, columnist with Hurryiet and Al-Monitor, wrote in Al-Monitor, Jan. 3: "The fact that the Gulen movement has carefully avoided joining the anti-Israeli sentiment within Turkey's Islamic circles (including Gulen's much-discussed opposition to the Gaza flotilla of 2010) is taken as evidence for the Israeli conspiracy. Pro-AKP media are full of articles these days that depict the Gulen movement as the fifth column or the Trojan horse of 'Zionism.'"

Erdogan has been striking out against numerous authorities involved in the corruption investigation, just part of his increasingly anti-democratic, authoritarian behaviour. As AP noted, "The government removed hundreds of police officers from key posts as it fights to contain the corruption scandal and has also introduced a highly contentious draft bill that would tighten its grip over a council that appoints judges and prosecutors and strengthen control over the judiciary."

Writing for Tablet magazine (Jan. 14) about the raid on the IHH, Yair Rosenberg observed that the "news from Turkey would appear to bolster Israel's contention that at least some members of the flotilla were not the humanitarians they claimed – if only three years too late to save Israel from international opprobrium."

Not to be forgotten either is the apology that, at the urging of U.S. President Barack Obama, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu extended to Erdogan last March for the Mavi Mamara fatalities. That effort to break the impasse in relations between Turkey and Israel has proved largely futile, and, thanks to Erdogan, it's an impasse that remains mostly unchanged today.

Paul Michaels is director of research and senior media relations with the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

The Jewish education conundrum

Last week, JTA published an essay by Sam Ser entitled "Jewish day school? Not for this observant Jewish family."

In his piece, Ser, a Michigan native who works for his local Jewish high school, summarized the grave challenge facing the Jewish education system: Here is a man who wants to send his kids to Jewish day school, and yet he can't afford to (and won't accept a subsidy). Instead, Ser and his wife (who also works in Jewish education) have decided to enrol their kids in public school and do Jewish education on their own.

As I read the article, I found myself nodding along, and I know I wasn't the only one. Ser's model of cheap, customized Jewish education is a compelling alternative for the growing number of young families crippled by the cost of Jewish schools – a do-it-yourself approach to Jewish education. Why spend hundreds of thousands of dollars on day school when you can offer your kids their very own, made-to-measure Jewish education at a fraction of the price?

I confess to be considering just the kind of thing Ser outlines. At the current rate, I won't be able to afford Jewish education for my daughter without accepting dramatic lifestyle changes (for myself, but also for her), and I don't think I could stomach someone else paying instead of me. So she might go to public school and get her Jewish education at home.

I could very well end up being my daughter's primary Jewish educator, unless day school gets a lot more affordable very soon – and I think I'm fine with that. In fact, I'm fairly confident I can, with a little help from family and friends, bring up a good Jewish daughter without day school.

That's exactly why it's important to be reminded every once in a while why many Jews continue to assert that day school is so essential, and why they are willing to bear the financial burden associated with it.

An appropriate example made headlines recently when two Orthodox high schools in New York decided to allow female students to wrap tfillin during prayers. (As The CJN's Sheri Shefa reported, Rabbi Lee Buckman, head of school at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, supports female students at his school who might want to follow the lead of their American cousins.)

Whether you're of the opinion that women being permitted to wear tfillin is a bold step forward for Orthodox Judaism or you believe there's no basis for such an interpretation of Jewish law, this episode proves young people are invested in shaping the future of Judaism, and that the day school system is an incubator for their exploration.

If my daughter doesn't attend Jewish day school, will she miss out on being part of the evolution of Judaism? For everything I can teach her about our religion, I fear she'll be less likely to participate in the development of Judaism if she's not enrolled in day school – where, as the tfillin story proves, that process is very much underway. And that makes me wonder whether I can afford to deprive her of such a unique opportunity, whatever the cost.

CIJA responds to francophones

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) is pleased that Jack Jedwab, a former director of the Canadian Jewish Congress-Quebec region, lauds our work to oppose the so-called charter of Quebec values as both "forceful and articulate" ("Values charter could 'devastate' community," Cjnews.com).

However, we would like to reassure readers of The CJN that the inclusion of Israel in our name in no way impedes CIJA from making our community's voice heard in the francophone media. We are, in fact, regularly asked to comment on a wide range of Jewish-related issues with no connection to Israel.

Indeed, on the issue of the charter itself, CIJA has been quoted, interviewed and mentioned on some 60 separate instances in the francophone print and electronic media, more so than any other community-based advocacy organization. CIJA is always available to provide information and commentary on its work on behalf of our community.

Harper's trip to Israel

Sheryl Nestel of Independent Jewish Voices Canada ("Harper's Israel trip criticized," The CJN, Jan. 23) got one thing correct when she wrote that the government of Canada's stance "does not reflect the opinions of all of Canada's Jews."

The government of Canada's stance does not reflect the opinions of those Jews who support a Palestinian right of return and would thus have Israel, as a Jewish state, commit national suicide; nor the opinions of those Jews who support the Palestinian call for boycott, divestment and sanctions against Israel; nor the opinions of those Jews who oppose Israel's naval blockade of Gaza, which prevents weapons falling into the hands of terrorists; nor the opinions of those Jews who oppose the separation fence, which prevents the murder of Israeli men, women and children.

The government of Canada's stance, thankfully, does not reflect the opinions of Independent Jewish Voices Canada, which advocates for each and every one of these positions.

We live in an era where there are national campaigns in the United States, Britain and other countries by anti-Israel groups, including associations of university professors, calling for academic boycotts of Israel.

This is why it is heartening to hear of the partnership between Dalhousie University and Ben-Gurion University of the Negev to create an ocean studies centre in Eilat ("Dalhousie, BGU to create ocean studies centre," The CJN, Jan. 30).

This is a good example of Canadian academia opting out of, as Prime Minister Stephen Harper so aptly put it in his recent address to the Knesset, "going along to get along."

Aislin's controversial cartooning

I'd be inclined to cut Aislin some slack ("Aislin rejects accusations over Harper cartoon," The CJN, Jan. 30).

But I wonder if he has the guts to paint a similar political cartoon showing someone's face covered by a Muslim flag. If not, and he and his editors felt that this would be too controversial, then all his rationalizations are just a bunch of bull.

Show some love

Rabbi Philip Scheim expresses his hope that there be more of a connection between rabbis of different affiliations in our community ("What happened to the love?" The CJN, Jan. 9). I would like to piggyback on that wish by suggesting that each of us form a connection with a fellow Jew, no matter his or her status or affiliation.

I suggest as a first step something simple. How about greeting a fellow Jew with a "Good Shabbos"? Those two warm, friendly words can bring us closer together.

Canada and U.S. diverge on Israel, Mideast

Be thankful we have Harper, not Obama

Michael Taube

It's no big secret that Prime Minister Stephen Harper and U.S. President Barack Obama are on opposite ends of the political spectrum. They have different political ideologies, economic viewpoints and international perspectives.

And when you compare Harper and Obama's overall political records, the prime minister has a huge advantage.

Harper has won three straight federal elections, modernized the Conservative Party, taken principled policy positions and effectively managed the economy from a centre-right perspective.

Obama, who is in his second term in the White House, has crushed the U.S. economy, overseen soaring unemployment levels, and has supported half-baked policy programs like Obamacare.

Harper's and Obama's divergent positions on Israel and the Middle East are also worth noting. The former has become Israel's greatest friend and ally, whereas the latter is now viewed with concern and, on occasion, suspicion when it comes to Israel's safety and security.

Yet in spite of all this, Obama maintains a solid edge in popularity among Canadians. Two polling firms, Harris/Decima and Angus Reid, found that 68 per cent and 72 per cent of Canadians, respectively, would have voted for Obama in the 2012 presidential election. (Contrast this number with the 51.1 per cent he ultimately received from U.S. voters.)

Jewish voting patterns for Harper and Obama are also puzzling.

According to an Ipsos-Reid exit poll, 52 per cent of Canadian Jews supported Harper's Conservatives in the 2011 federal election. While that's the highest tally ever recorded for a right-leaning Canadian political party, it's a low number considering Harper's long standing philo-Semitic positions and pro-Israel leanings.

In contrast, Obama received 71 per cent of the Jewish vote in the 2012 presidential election. To Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney's credit, his 29 per cent tally was the highest earned by an American conservative in nearly 25 years. Regardless, he lost to a liberal Democrat who pays more lip service to Israel, and gets less results, than any U.S. president in recent history.

To be fair, the winds of political change are still blowing in different directions. Canadian Jews are just starting to abandon the left-wing political malaise that has haunted them for generations. In time, their American counterparts will hopefully become more balanced when it comes to voting for the GOP.

In the meantime, here's another reason Canadian Jews should be grateful that Obama doesn't hold one of our passports: his preposterous position on Muslim anti-Semitism.

In an interview with The New Yorker's David Remnick, Obama said that "the interests of Israel in stability and security are actually very closely aligned with the interests of the Sunni states." You're not alone in scratching your head over this puzzling analysis of Israel-Sunni Muslim relations.

Obama went on to make this eye-popping statement: "What's preventing them from entering into even an informal alliance with at least normalized diplomatic relations is not that their interests are profoundly in conflict, but the Palestinian issue, as well as a long history of anti-Semitism that's developed over the course of decades there, and anti-Arab sentiment that's increased inside of Israel based on seeing buses being blown up. If you can start unwinding some of that, that creates a new equilibrium."

That's right. The U.S. president believes the scourge of Muslim anti-Semitism is only a few decades old. Clearly, the centuries of anti-Semitic hatred initiated by Fatimid caliph Al-Hakim and later Al-Malik, which affected Jews living in northern Syria and Morocco, must have escaped his vast knowledge of the region.

Let's contrast this with Harper's rational position on anti-Semitism.

In his speech to the Israeli Knesset on Jan. 20, the prime minister said, "we have witnessed, in recent years, the mutation of the old disease of anti-Semitism and the emergence of a new strain. We all know about the old anti-Semitism. It was crude and ignorant, and it led to the horrors of the death camps." Harper also noted "in many dark corners, it is still with us... in much of the western world, the old hatred has been translated into more sophisticated language for use in polite society."

This led to one of Harper's most impressive statements. "Think about the twisted logic and outright malice behind that: a state, based on freedom, democracy and the rule of law, that was founded so Jews can flourish, as Jews, and seek shelter from the shadow of the worst racist experiment in history, that is condemned, and that condemnation is masked in the language of anti-racism. It is nothing short of sickening. But this is the face of the new anti-Semitism. It targets the Jewish people by targeting Israel and attempts to make the old bigotry acceptable for a new generation."

For the record: I'm a small "c" conservative. I've known Harper since 1996. I worked as one of his speechwriters. As well, I've occasionally been critical of the Tories for not being fiscally conservative enough.

Take me out of the equation, however. Wouldn't you want a Canadian leader with a solid economic record, one with a strategic and tactical political mind, and who takes strong principled positions rather than politically correct ones? And wouldn't you want someone in charge who supports Israel's right to defend itself – and abhors the history of anti-Semitism?

Canadian Jews – and all Canadians – should, therefore, be pleased to have Stephen Harper, and not Barack Obama, as their political leader.

Another take on controversial cartoon

Gil Troy in Montreal

Prime Minister Stephen Harper's recent trip to Israel was triumphal. At a time when Israelis frequently feel criticized, boycotted, abandoned, delegitimized, he represented the silent majority of citizens in the world's major democracies who not only accept Israel's right to exist, but cherish Israel's contribution to the world.

And in an era when Canada's importance in the world is often underappreciated, Israel's warm welcome and the resonance of Harper's words proved that Canada counts. Unfortunately, in Montreal, the happy story of Harper's pilgrimage was sullied somewhat by Aislin's controversial cartoon blasting the trip. Many deemed the cartoon anti-Semitic – I do not – and I think the disagreement is instructive.

The cartoon pictured Harper's face wrapped in the Israeli flag, with the Jewish Star prominently smothering his mouth. The implication was that Harper's true thoughts were being silenced. Those who thought it was anti-Semitic felt Aislin was claiming that "The Jews" were muffling Harper and that Aislin's Jewish imagery triggered anti-Semitic accusations of Jewish power and money manipulating politicians.

I know the despicable past and odious present of those accusations. I do not dismiss them or take them lightly. I believe Israel's critics should have a moral responsibility not to stir the anti-Semitic beasts that are so easily roused in the world today, even in the enlightened West. But allow me to offer two, more benign, readings of the cartoon.

As a Zionist, I understand that Judaism is both a nation and a religion, meaning that the Jewish Star is both a national and religious symbol. Aislin did not use the Jewish Star, he used the Jewish Star on the Israeli flag, which is the flag of a sovereign country. The Zionist revolution entailed bringing the Jews back to history, maturing enough to take responsibility and take criticism. If Aislin wants to criticize Israel, isn't it reasonable to use the Israeli flag with its Jewish Star as a cartoonist's shorthand, as the most recognizable symbol of Israel?

I regret that we live in a world where anti-Semitism continues, where the delegitimization of Israel has anti-Semitic foundations, where anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism overlap and where, therefore, it is hard sometimes to criticize Israel without appearing anti-Semitic.

As an historian, I recall that in the 1980s, the Canadian prime minister, Brian Mulroney, and the American president, Ronald Reagan, hit it off. Both were conservatives trying to reform liberal policies. Both were Irish raconteurs. And they had great chemistry together. Many Canadian progressive elites – who claim they are beyond patriotic yet harbour an anti-Americanism that in itself expresses their patriotism – feared this friendship. They worried that Mulroney was being too chummy and that Canadian needs were being subordinated to American whims. Had Aislin – who probably believed that – drawn a cartoon with Mulroney's face smothered by an American flag, would anyone perceive that as bigoted or simply caustic?

Israel must be mature enough as a country to accept harsh criticism, even as critics should be wise enough not to inflame historic sensitivities built up unhappily over millennia of suffering. But I would rather live in a world wherein we give each other the benefit of the doubt and are slow to take offence, than live in a hair-trigger, hyper-sensitive world wherein caricatures of Mohammed lead to death threats and riots.

Within that spectrum, of course, note that the Jewish community's anguish was sincere, but the protests were peaceful. The most dramatic move contemplated was cancelling Montreal Gazette subscriptions – which is a legitimate move, even if the objection was only about Aislin's politics not his imagery. That's part of the democratic give and take. Cartoonists (and columnists) provoke, and sometimes their publishers pay the price (or reap the benefit).

There is also a tactical issue here. Unless a cartoonist really crosses the line, fighting satire with outrage is usually a losing proposition. You look unnecessarily thin-skinned – and give the offending cartoon far more publicity than you intended – which is what happened with the Aislin counter-attack.

Ultimately, Stephen Harper proved Aislin wrong. Harper is just not that good an actor. His four-day trip to Israel was not bought or dictated. It was a sincere expression of genuine friendship by a statesman who understands that for all its challenges and shortcomings, Israel is a plucky democracy doing great things and sharing core Canadian and democratic values. Maybe that's what upset Aislin and the other blame-Israel-first types most!

An expiry date for 'never again'?

Urban Writer Avrum Rosensweig

Prime Minister Stephen Harper's recent trip to the Land of Israel, our Eretz Yisrael, appeared to be a mission, a Haj of sorts, a trip he saved as the dessert during his days as prime minister of the country.

It was unusual to watch because, along with the traditional pomp of such trips, there was excess baggage that no doubt worried the grounds crew, the question of whether Harper's newly painted, blue Polaris CC-150 military aircraft could take off. But it did so, pageantry and all.

So many of us appreciated the fervour of Harper's visit (referred to by Jonathan Kay as "manic" in the National Post, Jan. 21) and his words of support for our homeland, Israel, and her values. We're tired of the malodorous and foul smelling anti-Semitism and anti-Israel sentiment permeating the United Nations and the majority of the world's nation-states, and our prime minister successfully swung that pendulum back, at least a few positions, to allow supporters of Israel to experience great pride.

But while large segments of the Canadian Jewish community embrace Harper as the world's most vocal head of state in support of Israel, isn't it healthy and wise for them to be similarly multi-dimensional in their outlook on the man, his party and its national policies? Shouldn't we strengthen our political selves by grappling with his entire ideology and body of work?

As constituents, isn't that the judicious thing for us to do – for Harper, for our country and for our people?

For if we don't, if we simply see our prime minister as a one-issue leader whose very vocal support of Israel eclipses the ramifications of his very damaging national policies, are we not, indeed, undermining who we are as Canadians and as lovers of Israel? By telling our current government all is well as long as you care about Israel in the way you do, aren't we negating our influence and commitment to other important values such as pikuach nefesh – the preservation of human life – within our boundaries, and assistance to the poor?

Once again, I thank the government of Canada for investing so heavily in its recent trip to Israel. I call upon our community to remember the prime minister's fervent speech to the Knesset, but at the same time, to re-embrace our commitment to "never again," particularly having to do with today's refugee claimants to Canada who are regularly turned away from our hospitals, and more seriously, our shores.

I ask that you look closely at the situation of the Roma right now, those who walked beside us to the ovens of Auschwitz but today are without a homeland. Ponder very seriously how it is our government minimizes the persecution levied at the Roma people in Hungary and the European Union, and how we are okay with its cold and dispassionate refugee policies. Where is our sympathy and compassion for the refugee, as embodied in our love for Israel and the millions of refugees who came to her shores?

When we watched Harper at Yad Vashem, why did we not challenge ourselves on our promise to help those who came after us to this nation, Canada? Once we were finished celebrating our prime minister's trip to Israel, why were we not inclined to call our members of Parliament demanding an explanation for the preservation of shanty towns we call native reserves and the below average medical care extended to our Aboriginal Peoples? Is this fair to our government, to our community, to our native brothers and sisters?

Does "never again" have an expiry date?

Support for a leader requires balance and thoughtfulness. While Canada's backing of Israel will not ensure Israel's overall security and global acceptance or our place in the world, it is sensible to be supportive of "Harper to Israel." But to be a constituent, an attentive Jew, a well-balanced national and global citizen, we must also challenge the hell out of him on other aspects of his leadership, including laws and policies affecting the "stranger" – the men, women and children, like our ancestors, who are the most marginalized and alone within our borders today. That, too, is a Jewish value.

Am Yisrael Chai. The nation of Israel lives.

Oh Canada! We stand on guard for thee.

Open Hillel seeks to make Hillel more inclusive of all viewpoints

Zane Colt, a fourth-year public administration student at Carleton University and city-wide president of Ottawa's IAC, said the social media code of conduct isn't new, but the IAC only recently posted it on its Facebook page in response to pro-BDS comments there.

Colt said the IAC is open to diverse opinions, as long as they promote positive dialogue, which BDS does not.

"[BDS] shuts down the debate," he said. "If [the BDS campaign] were ever successful, it would result in the destruction of Israel. As the world's only Jewish state, we don't want to give a platform to support BDS rhetoric."

At Harvard University, Emily Unger discovered the implications of Hillel's policy of not partnering with pro-BDS organizations when she tried to run a joint event in November 2012 between her group, the Progressive Jewish Alliance, and the Palestine Solidarity Committee (PSC).

The event, called "Jewish Voices Against the Occupation," brought in two speakers, one Israeli and one American, to talk about their experience in non-violent activism against Israel's policies regarding the Palestinian territories.

Harvard Hillel leaders agreed to host the event in Hillel's building, but changed their mind after learning the event was being co-sponsored by the PSC.

That's when Unger – who describes herself as a non-Zionist, religiously observant Jew – decided to take action.

"It's very important to not completely cut off the Jewish community from hearing Palestinian voices," she told The CJN. "We should be able to hear all of those views and debate them openly and not limit what political views are considered."

In January 2013, Unger co-founded the Open Hillel movement, which seeks to change Hillel's guidelines to make them more inclusive of all viewpoints, including those on the far right and far left.

A resolution passed by the Hillel chapter at Swarthmore College near Philadelphia this past December officially rejected the guidelines, declaring itself to be the first "Open Hillel."

Since then, Hillel International CEO and president Eric Fingerhut has called for a review of Hillel's chapter guidelines. Hillel International did not respond to requests for comment for this article.

Isaac Kates Rose, a University of Toronto student and national youth director of Hashomer Hatzair, a socialist-Zionist youth group, said he'd like to see Hillel chapters organize town hall events to discuss Hillel policies, and "how Hillel can be a centre for healthy conversation, even with those with whom we disagree vehemently.

"I would courageously advise we loosen those strictures and bring in speakers and groups who challenge us but also force us to have a nuanced understanding [of the issues]," he said.

But Scott Goldstein, executive director of Hillel Ottawa, said support for BDS is beyond the pale – and, therefore, working with groups that support it is prohibited under the guidelines – because it questions Israel's right to exist and doesn't promote positive dialogue.

However, Unger said she disagrees with the argument that a successful BDS campaign would destroy Israel as a Jewish state.

"I think that there are a lot of people, especially Jewish people, who support BDS as a way of putting pressure to end the occupation of the Palestinian territories... not to make Israel stop being a Jewish state," she said.

Levitan added that Hillel Ottawa has even refused to acknowledge that there are Jewish students who support targeted boycotts, such as only boycotting products made in West Bank settlements.

In response, Goldstein said Hillel opposes partial, targeted BDS actions, because such an approach "isn't an effective way of bringing dialogue."

Unger said she believes Hillel should open its doors even wider by including students who are morally against ethnic nation-states in general.

Goldstein said Hillel Ottawa welcomes all Jewish students to its events, and debates are welcome at its numerous Shabbat dinners, but political debates fall under the IAC's jurisdiction, and the IAC does endorse specific political positions. Thus, any events advertised through or sponsored by the IAC must be in support of Israel as a Jewish state.

"This [division] allows Jewish students who may be critical of Israel's policies to pursue Jewish campus life and feel welcome at all our events without feeling pressured to conform to the Israel component of our mandate," he said.

But religion aside, Unger said there's no reason to avoid partnering with non-Jewish students who do hold those beliefs.

"It's not productive to cut off dialogue. Lots of Palestinian students have legitimate and non-hateful reasons for supporting a secular bi-national state or supporting BDS to end occupation of their homeland," she said. "I think it's important for us to be able to hear those views even if we don't agree with them."

Still, Goldstein said that while there are many places on campus for these discussions to take place, Hillel is not one of them.

"They're welcome to express their views within their own forum but can't use our platform to express those views."

Christian families could be cut off from agricultural lands

Canadian bishops urge change to barrier route

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops (CCCB) is calling on Foreign Minister John Baird to intervene on behalf of West Bank residents who will be adversely affected by an extension to Israel's security barrier that will pass through a Christian village.

CCCB president and archbishop of Gatineau Paul-Andre Durocher wrote a letter to Baird on Jan. 28, on the eve of an Israeli Supreme Court hearing to decide whether the Israeli government could go ahead with their proposed plan.

The hearing took place Jan. 29, and a final decision is expected this week.

The letter outlined the fact that if the barrier is extended through the Cremisan Valley – which lies in the West Bank on the Palestinian side of the Green Line adjacent to the towns of Beit Jala and Bethlehem – many of the 58 Christian families who live there will be "cut off from their agricultural land and some 400 impoverished children from their school," Durocher wrote.

"The barrier will harm those families whose livelihoods depend on these lands, and will cut off other families from their agricultural and recreational lands and water sources. Should the barrier be built as proposed, it will also be virtually impossible for the Salesian Sisters there to fulfil their mission of service to the local community."

John Baird

Durocher, who spoke with The CJN last week, explained that he is part of a delegation of bishops from around the world who visit annually with Catholic communities in and around Israel, including the Cremisan Valley community.

"They've expressed to us many times how seriously this will impact their livelihood. The sisters who run the school there, the brothers who have a monastery, everything will be completely disrupted. Even they say, 'Look, we have no trouble with the security wall. We understand that, but it doesn't have to be built here,'" Durocher said.

"Their feeling is that the security wall, if it was built on Israeli territory, not across what is presently considered occupied territory, it would suffice to guarantee the security of the settlements that are there. The point is to protect the settlements – it doesn't have to pass through their valley. We find that it's an unnecessary construction."

In his letter to Baird, Durocher wrote that his organization is "aware of Israel's need for security, and we fully support that right. Nevertheless, we believe the wall as planned will only deepen the wounds between Palestinians and Israelis… As it is, the security wall is already perceived by many as an illegal 'land grab.'"

According to the Catholic Register, at the Israeli Supreme Court hearing last week, retired Israeli Col. Shaul Arieli spoke on behalf of the Israeli Council for Peace and Security and proposed "an alternative route for the barrier that would still be beyond the Israeli border but would not reach into the Cremisan Valley."

But Israel's Ministry of Defence released a statement that said it "values the protection of both human life and the environment," but is "committed first and foremost to maintaining the safety and security of the citizens of Israel… The route was relocated to an area where the impact on the [water] terraces and the view will be most limited."

Durocher said he hopes the Israeli government will be receptive to his group's concerns.

"We're not trying to influence the Supreme Court's decision. We're calling on the government of Israel to kind of revisit the whole issue… Do they really need to pass the wall through there in order to guarantee security, or is there another way to do this that would allow these people to have access to their lands?" he said.

"We would definitely like our foreign ministry to raise this issue with Israel and to explain to them that it is a concern. There are also issues of religious freedoms that are involved here and so in that sense, we would like our foreign minister to raise the issue. I think our government is in a good position to raise issues like this with the Israeli government, because of its status as a good friend of Israel."

He said he has not yet heard back from the ministry on the issue. Calls to Baird's office were not returned by The CJN's deadline.

U.S. influence waning as Iran more assertive: analyst

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The Middle East is witnessing "a change of profound importance" in which U.S. power is being eclipsed by a regional coalition led by Iran. At the same time, Sunni powers led by Saudi Arabia, feeling abandoned by their U.S. patron, are pushing back.

That was the assessment of Mideast analyst Jonathan Spyer, who last week addressed a business lunch lecture sponsored by the Speakers Action Group at the law offices of Bennett Jones. Spyer was joined by panellists Mike Fegelman, executive director of Honest Reporting Canada; media commentator John Thompson, a director of the Speakers Action Group; and Sohail Raza, executive member of Muslims Facing Tomorrow.

The Middle East is undergoing a transformational change in which an Iran-led bloc is "pushing forward" while American influence in the region is waning. "This is a change of profound importance," said Spyer, senior research fellow at the Global Research in International Affairs Center in Herzliya, Israel.

The once-expected fall of Syrian strongman Bashir Assad has failed to materialize as thousands of Shia fighters have poured into the country from Lebanon, Iraq and Iran to prop up his regime. The Sunni rebels have been pushed back, and "no one talks about Assad's fall. Nothing is imminent," Spyer said.

At the same time, former Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak was forced to resign while the United States encouraged elections based on "a happy and irrationally naive conception of what the Muslim Brotherhood was."

U.S. allies "are terrified" at this turn of events, wondering why they should reside under the American umbrella when they could be so readily abandoned. "The King of Saudi Arabia above all others was terrified by this process," he said.

With the United States on the sidelines, the Abdel Fattah el-Sisi coup in Egypt took power back from the Muslim Brotherhood. "Undoubtedly this coup was a Saudi production" contrary to American desires. "It is an astonishing turn of events," Spyer said. "They feel their patron is no longer willing or able to defend their interests."

As for Israel, it continues to maintain security co-operation with the United States, despite "disastrous" American diplomacy in the region.

"Our friends are behaving with inexplicable strangeness in terms of their relations with the region. It is bizarre and it must stop."

To counteract declining American influence, Israel is forging new relationships with China and India. "There is a burgeoning security relationship with India" accompanied by growing trade ties.

Israel is well placed, both economically and socially, to deal with the new threats in the region. "I fear more for the Christian minorities in the Middle East than for Israel. The Christians do not have a structure [like Israel] to protect them," Spyer said.

Currently, in the Middle East, a single arc of conflict stretches from the Mediterranean all the way to Yemen.

"Ultimately, what all this is about is the failures of Arab states," in particular their inability to address issues of socio-economic development and political progress important to local populations.

In the midst of all this Islamic in-fighting, Israel remains largely a "spectator." It finds itself "next door to a massive historical process, likely in its early stages." Israel is a powerful state with the tools to defend itself, including its armed forces and a buoyant economy.

"But this will be the challenge for Israel for the decade or two to come."

Responding to Spyer's analysis, Raza traced the roots of the Mideast's sectarian conflicts back centuries and said, "There is no chance for the conflict to end soon."

No regime is going to allow its sectarian rivals to have power, especially now that the United States is negotiating with Iran. Shia jihadis are pouring into Syria from across the world, including some from Canada.

Fegelman said the Syrian conflict poses difficult problems for the media. It is hard to get into the country and it's extremely dangerous once you are there. It's also very difficult for the press to determine which reports from Syria are accurate and which are propaganda.

In addition, "there is a certain media fatigue" in covering the war, leading to a "bias by omission."

One story not being told concerns the plight of Palestinian refugees in Syria's Yarmouk camp, "who are starving to death." You'd think advocates of the Palestinian cause would be publicizing that story, he said.

From 85 to 96 Palestinians have died of starvation and illness in the camp since mid-2013, according to media reports.

Thompson said Al Qaeda is following a well-established blueprint in the Syrian war by bringing in foreign volunteers – including Canadians – training and indoctrinating them, exposing them to violence, and then sending them back to their countries of origin.

A similar pattern was established in Bosnia and Algeria in the 1990s, as well as in Iraq in 2003-04.

However, the Assad regime has been pretty successful in killing the Al Qaeda jihadis. "They're not coming back," he added.

Spyer said Al Qaeda now controls a significant chunk of territory on the Syria-Iraq border, posing a threat that Israel must address.

Israel's Shin Bet internal security service recently broke up an Al Qaeda cell based in Jerusalem, which was preparing to leave for Turkey and then go on to Syria.

"It's a new challenge," he said. "We'll be dealing with it for some time to come."

Canadian YU students meet peers in Ukraine

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Three Canadian students headed abroad last month as part of a "service learning mission" that brought 20 Yeshiva University (YU) students to Kharkov, Ukraine, where they learned about the local Jewish community.

Aitan Magence, a 20-year-old biology student who went on the trip with his sister Yona, called the week-long visit the best experience of his life.

"I wasn't really expecting anything when we got there. I thought we were going to the hotel and unpack," said the Thornhill, Ont., native.

"But when we got there, all of our Ukrainian peers were at the airport with balloons… My first impression was, 'Wow, this is going to be an amazing week.'"

Zvi Zobin, a 20-year-old accounting major who is originally from Toronto, said he decided to go on the trip because he wanted to know more about the former Soviet Union, where his parents had grown up.

"When else would I get to go to Ukraine?" he said.

The goal of the trip, Magence said, was to learn about the global Jewish community, specifically about how Jews live around the world. To do that, they interacted with Ukrainian Jewish teenagers and young adults, learning about their lifestyles.

Zvi Zobin running a Tu b'Shvat activity for Grade 1 students at a Ukrainian Jewish day school.

Since the trip overlapped with Tu b'Shvat, the group spent one day at a Jewish day school teaching the kids songs. They also visited a group of seniors and a Chabad rabbi.

Both Magence and Zobin called that meeting with the rabbi in Sumy, Ukraine, one of the memorable parts of the trip. He told them about his life in Ukraine – how he can't simply go to a grocery store to find kosher food, but has to form relationships with local farmers in order to ensure his food is kosher.

"I never realized how difficult life would be if I couldn't go to the store and buy necessities," Magence said, adding that he was especially surprised when the American-born rabbi told the students he didn't view the challenges as sacrifices, but rather just part of Ukrainian life.

The students also spent time visiting the local Jewish community centre, where they learned that Ukrainian university-aged students organized much of the programming.

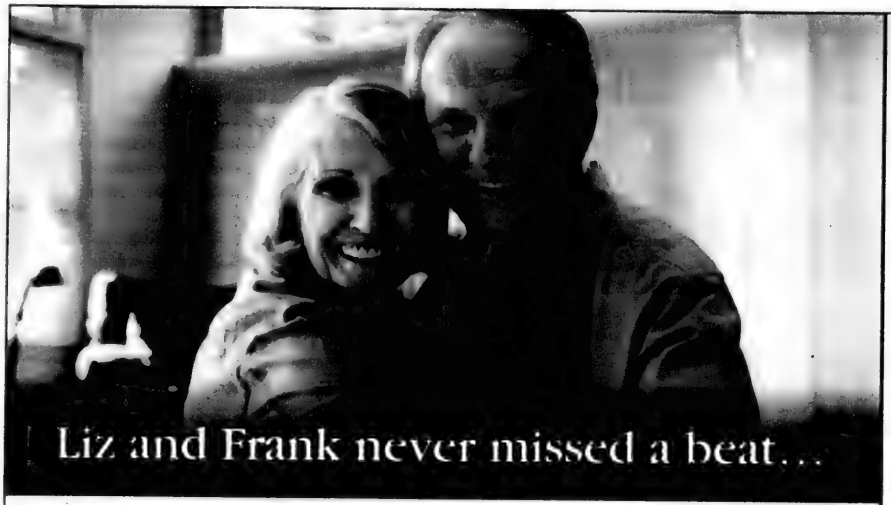
"There are people our age who are running all these programs in the JCC," he said. "So if we see something missing in our community, why shouldn't we stand up and help out?"

Despite being in Ukraine amid protests and civil unrest, both Magence and Zobin said they saw very little of it in Kharkov.

"I don't think it really affects them so much," Magence said, explaining that when pressed on the topic, their Ukrainian peers mostly focused on how the protests are damaging the capital, rather than discussing the politics of the situation.

Magence said for him, the most powerful moment of the trip was the final activity: singing, dancing and davening on Shabbat.

"Although we spoke different languages," he said, "we all came together and were united by the fact that we were all Jewish."



And now they're ready for the next step.

They took their first whirl around the dance floor over 50 years ago and have been kicking up their heels ever since. When they started looking for retirement living options, they were pleased to find out that Chartwell offers active lifestyle programs like their signature Rhythm n' Moves class.

And while they are enjoying a busy lifestyle today, they appreciate the peace of mind in knowing that Chartwell offers flexibility and choice to help with changing care needs in the future. Until that time, they'll continue to follow where the music leads in their new Chartwell home.

Bat mitzvah project honours grandmother

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Marya Nurgitz, 12, created her bat mitzvah project to honour her late grandmother.

On Jan. 23, she invited a group of friends to work on a quilt she plans to donate to the Toronto Jewish Quilting Project, which provides quilts for people touched by cancer.

Marya, a Grade 7 student at Netivot HaTorah Day School, said her grandmother died in 1998 from cancer, "and I feel that [this project] honours her and includes her in my bat mitzvah spiritually, even though she isn't here physically."

She said that when her mother, Sarah, asked her how she wanted to celebrate her bat mitzvah, she knew immediately that she wanted to do a charity project.

"Everyone, as a child, thinks about me, me, me, and what they want for themselves. Obviously, that includes me as well. I decided I just had to celebrate my bat mitzvah with some sort of tzedakah."

Marya said she and her mother contacted Eva Karpati, a breast cancer survivor, who 10 years ago founded the Toronto Jewish Quilting Project, now a project of National Council of Jewish Women, Toronto section.

"I just loved the idea of a young, Jewish group meeting to quilt, and discovering a new art form," Karpati said. "People often think of groups getting together to quilt in church basements. Why not quilt in a Jewish environment? The camaraderie between women in a quilting group is amazing. Men are absolutely invited to attend our meetings, but somehow, they just don't come."

Marya said that before the actual event, she asked all the guests what they would like on their quilted square, perhaps their name or an item that means something to them. She chose images and emailed them to the girls, until they were satisfied.

"Then I drew each image by hand and traced it onto adhesive paper. This was ironed onto the fabric used for the image and cut out. Then I pulled off the paper and ironed the fabric onto the blue square. The whole process took about 40 hours.

"My friends liked the party a lot," Marya said. "We didn't completely finish the quilt, but we plan to get together again to finish it."

Karpati said she would love to see the group continue. "We have discussed starting a satellite group at Netivot."

Jewish Learning: Jewish Living
Genuine Choice, Genuine Commitment

A multi-denominational course, ideal for those exploring the possibility of conversion to Judaism

Each person's journey towards Judaism is organic and individual. We invite you to explore Judaism and your growing relationship with it through the lenses of different Jewish denominations.

This course introduces the central Jewish ideas and practices, texts and experiences that form the foundation of a Jewish life. If you decide to pursue conversion, this course will give you the tools to choose an informed, healthy and whole commitment to Jewish living and the Jewish people.

This course is solely an educational endeavor. Enrolling does not guarantee conversion. An individual who chooses to pursue conversion will choose a mentoring rabbi/educator and will continue the process based on the rabbi/educator's specific denominational requirements.

Community.
Coexistence.
Culture.

Someone, somewhere in Jerusalem benefits from a Jerusalem Foundation project every minute of every day. This is particularly true in the Mevasha neighbourhood, which sits on the seam line between east and west Jerusalem, a neighbourhood made up of Jews and Arabs, the secular and the religious and many economically challenged. Thanks to the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada this neighbourhood is home to Canada House – a place that empowers the community, fosters economic independence, and is a source of pride for young and old alike.

THE SINGLE MOST IMPORTANT CITY IN THE

Ballets Jazz de Montréal returns to Israel

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Les Ballets Jazz de Montréal (BJM), an acclaimed 42-year-old company, is touring Israel this week, underscoring the growing cultural ties between Quebec and the Jewish state.

Just prior to its departure, artistic director Louis Robitaille said that it was with "immense joy" that the troupe was returning to Israel, where it toured in June 2011 for the first time in more than a generation.

That experience had been "coup de foudre" (love at first sight) for the young dancers because of "the magnificent hospitality, not to mention the incredible climate," Robitaille said at a Jan. 29 press conference held in the majestic atrium of the historic Edifice Gaston-Miron, BJM's headquarters.

BJM director general Jay Rankin said, "Quebecers, like Israelis, are a people who embrace the arts, above all, dance."

Israel's consul general in Montreal, Joel Lion, said this tour reinforces the friendship that has existed between Canada and Israel for 65 years.

Between the lines, the BJM's encore Israeli tour in less than three years is being seen as defying the boycott of Israel that certain members of the province's artistic community have called for in recent years.

BJM is performing at the Israeli Opera in Tel Aviv from Feb. 2 to 5, at the Jerusalem Theatre on Feb. 6, and at the Haifa Auditorium on Feb. 8. An entourage of 18 is there, including 13 dancers.

In 2011, the itinerary included shorter runs in Tel Aviv, Haifa and Be'er Sheva.

The current tour is supported by Conseil des arts et des lettres du Québec – whose touring director, Hélène Boutet, was on hand to wish the troupe well – along with the Canada Council for the Arts and the Quebec Ministry of International Relations, with contributions from the Jewish Community Foundation of Montreal, the Azrieli Foundation, the Henry and Berenice Kaufmann Foundation, and the Irving Ludmer Family Foundation.

The program includes three dances from BJM's newer repertoire, including Harry, a narrative work created for the company at Robitaille's invitation by American-Israeli choreographer Barak Marshall in 2012.

At the press conference, dancers performed three excerpts from this high-energy work, which incorporates a dozen different types of music by singers as diverse as Maria Callas and Wayne Newton.

"It was a real challenge for the artists, as Barak asked them to play characters and express themselves not only in dance, but also with sounds and dialogue," Robitaille said.

Told through the title character's inner and external challenges, including war, Harry, Robitaille continued, is "primarily about human conflicts: struggles with oneself, those between men and women, and social and international conflicts."

Marshall has said of BJM: "It's one of the tops in the world, with a wide and varied repertoire... I was pretty overwhelmed by the incredible diversity and depth of the dancers."

Geneviève Salbaing, now 92, the Parisian-born dancer who was one of BJM's co-founders, with Eddy Toussaint and the late Eva von Gencsy, was also present.

She remarked that this exuberant, athletic work is reminiscent of the early spirit of the company.

The BJM's return was greeted enthusiastically by the Jerusalem Post, which reported that its 2011 tour had "thrilled" audiences.

BJM presents an average of 60 performances a year abroad in Europe, North and South America and Asia. Its first tour to Israel was more than 25 years ago and comprised appearances at kibbutzim, recalled technical director Daniel Granger.

The Rt. Hon. Stephen J. Harper
Prime Minister of Canada

Thank you for being a true friend of Israel!

As someone who is concerned about the future of Israel, you surely understand that the "two-state plan" currently being devised would be disastrous for Israel and the region. A better and more realistic plan is being advanced by many politicians, academics and other prominent figures in Israel.

Presented to you by Women in Green and the Forum for Sovereignty

Knesset Speaker Mk Yuli Edelstein

"Sovereignty is to be applied in a gradual and practical matter. We must return to the discourse of our rights to the land, from the historic aspect as well. We did not occupy a Palestinian state, because there wasn't any such state".

Minister of Housing Uri Ariel

"The alternative to the leftist 'Two-State vision' is one state west of the Jordan River –the State of Israel".

Deputy Minister Tzipi Hotovely

"The goal is for Judea and Samaria to be under Israeli sovereignty. It is ours and it was acquired legally in a bloody, defensive war."

Coalition Head MK Yariv Levin

"We must create the conditions that will prepare for annexation. We must gradually apply legislation regarding the residents and the territory, for example zoning and building codes."

MK Miri Regev

"The Likud Constitution requires application of sovereignty over Judea and Samaria. As the sky did not fall after the application of Israeli law to the Golan Heights and East Jerusalem, thus it will be in Judea and Samaria".

Dani Dayan

Yesha council foreign minister

" Recently in Madrid I spoke to top Middle East policy makers about Israeli sovereignty –the only sovereignty relevant west of the Jordan River - and of our historical rights to the Land. They heard and read about Israeli sovereignty and the sky has not fallen "

Minister of Economy Naftali Bennett

"We must not and cannot establish a Palestinian State. The solution is immediate application of sovereignty over area C."

Deputy Minister Zeev Elkin

"Instead of talking over and over again about giving away land, the time has come to begin talking about a course of action leading to the application of sovereignty in Judea and Samaria."

Deputy Minister Rabbi Eli Ben Dahan

"No other people has any authority or sovereignty over this land".

Former Minister of Science Daniel Hershkowitz

"Along with settlement, which leads us in a practical way to the promise of sovereignty in Judea and Samaria, there must also be a public declaration to the entire world that this is our Land, and there is no better declaration than legal application of Israeli sovereignty in Judea and Samaria"

Samaria Local Council head Gershon Mesika

"Sovereignty is the basic element by which every people and every state is able to express its rule in the field".

Caroline Glick

Journalist and writer, senior contributing editor of the Jerusalem Post

"There are millions of people who understand that the 'Two-State' solution is a disaster. They are just waiting for someone to tell them they can abandon it. Israel has implemented the Israeli 'One-State' solution twice – in Jerusalem and the Golan Heights. Both experiences were successful"

DIVIDING A PENSION ON DIVORCE

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash

B. A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 32 years

Question: My husband and I are separating after six years. We both do not want to go through a lawyer but want everything to be legal. Our house is under my name. I understand that even though my husband is not the registered owner we need to divide the equity 50/50. Therefore, I am going to buy out his interest and give him half of the net equity. We plan to sign separation papers and file them with the local court ourselves, but we want everything to be legal. What are the appropriate procedures?

Answer: The law and procedures are so complex that you both need lawyers (independent legal advice) for such an agreement to be "legal" or legally enforceable. Anyone suggesting otherwise is mistaken. Moreover, asking me to give you "shortcuts" is no different then asking a surgeon to instruct a patient with a gallbladder stone on how to use a surgical knife after pointing out a few diagrams of the lower belly. For instance, some of the many issues a competent family law lawyer will resolve include the following:

1. Is there other property and debts on the date of marriage and on the date of separation? If so, and your husband has much more than you do, meaning a greater net worth over the course of the marriage, then maybe the split on the house equity should be much more than 50:50 in your favour. For instance, he might have a private pension that, after taxes, could be worth a great deal more than yours as of the date of separation. If so then the difference in value between your net worth and his will affect the split of the house equity, such that you might get 75% and he may only receive 25%. Or perhaps he has a business whose current value needs to be evaluated by a commercial valuator. Or he might own a yacht in Fiji?

2. If you buy out his interest in the home and he has co-signed on the mortgage then he will want the bank to release him from any continuing obligation. At the very least he will want a written indemnity from you to indemnity him from any lawsuit by the bank if you can't or don't pay as the bank loan becomes due.

3. These agreements are not filed with the court unless one of you receives child or spousal support and wants the payments to be enforced through the Ontario Government's Family Responsibility Office.

4. To be legal, you also need to formally exchange current income, asset and liability statements about each other in writing and be able to provide evidence that this has been done.

To my loyal readers: Recently I published a different article about matrimonial homes and how their equities were to be divided. It sparked a lot of interest and curiosity on how to calculate the split of equity in different fact scenarios. Watch for my follow-up!

B.C. mayor signs deal with Israeli tech firm

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

When Surrey, B.C., Mayor Dianne Watts announced last April that she planned to turn one square mile of her City Centre into a leading centre for medical technology, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) in the Pacific region immediately started paying attention.

"When we heard of her intention to create an Innovation Boulevard, we knew the mayor needed to tap into Israel's spirit of ingenuity," CIJA Pacific region director Darren Mackoff said.

Mackoff and his team helped organize a six-day trade mission to the Holy Land for Watts last month, with a delegation that included individuals from the health technology business sector and representatives from Simon Fraser University, the University of British Columbia and Kwantlen Polytechnic University – all of them key stakeholders in Surrey's Innovation Boulevard.

Dianne Watts (Wikimedia Commons)

In January, just a month after her return home, Watts signed a deal with Israel Brain Technologies (IBT), the first international deal of its kind secured since she and her Innovation Boulevard co-chair, SFU neuroscientist and professor Ryan D'Arcy, announced the boulevard last year. Israel Brain Technologies, created by Israeli president and Nobel Peace Prize winner Shimon Peres, is the country's most prestigious neuro-technology consortium. It unites Israel's academics, neuroscientists and industry leaders under a single umbrella of brain research and innovation.

The deal will give the City of Surrey access to some of Israel's top thinkers and the development of innovative, life-saving medical advances, Mackoff said, but it will also give IBT the opportunity to engage in exchanges and to partner on specific projects with their counterparts in Western Canada.

In a press release, Watts said, "Israel and Surrey have common health-care challenges and share the goal of setting a new standard in medical care and innovation. By combining our remarkable pool of talents and expertise, I know that Surrey and Israel will together create ground-breaking and life changing advancements in health care."

Watts' CIJA-led educational mission was packed with 25 business meetings at Israeli universities, hospitals and centres of innovation, political briefings, tours of Israel's most significant historic and contemporary sites, and a strategic visit to Israel's northern border with Syria, on the Golan Heights.

"In addition to gaining a strong understanding and appreciation for Israel and the challenges the Jewish state faces in the region, it was extremely important that Mayor Watts left Israel with tangible collaborative partnerships between the city, trip delegates and their counterparts in Israel," Mackoff said.

The blizzard-like conditions in Jerusalem on the mayor's day of arrival meant CIJA had to do some quick, on-the-ground improvising and move the team to Tel Aviv at the last minute. Nonetheless, the itinerary was executed seamlessly. Mackoff travelled with the mayor and says she was tremendously moved and inspired by this visit.

"The Jewish and pro-Israel community in Western Canada has a firm friend in Mayor Watts," he reflected. "She saw first-hand what Israel is truly about – a country that has overcome tremendous obstacles to create a thriving democracy that is leading the world in scientific advancements."

Chassidic councillor seeks to heal divisions

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Renegade or a canny handpick?

Mindy Pollak, who made history in November when she became the first chassidic woman elected to public office in Quebec – just as the values charter debate was red-hot – wants it known that she is emphatically neither.

Pollak, 25, has not deviated from the strict observance in which she was brought up and is adamant that the chassidic leadership did not choose her, behind the scenes, to represent them on the Outremont borough council because she projects a very different image of their community.

But she does wholly embrace the role of stereotype debunker without compromising her religious beliefs and way of life.

Pollak won the Claude Ryan district in the Nov. 3 Montreal election, the area with the borough's greatest concentration of Chassidim. She received a decisive 35 per cent of the vote, besting four other candidates including the Orthodox Sheldon Goldberg, who ran with successful mayoral candidate Denis Coderre, and independent Pierre Lacerte, who has been feuding with some Chassidim for a decade over alleged flouting of municipal regulations.

The turnout was 61 per cent, one of the highest in the entire city.

Pollak, interviewed in her tiny office at the borough hall, is apologetic for the clutter and the size – she'll be moving into larger space when renovations are completed.

Modestly dressed and wearing a sheitel, she is poised, warm and open to any questions.

The curiosity, even scrutiny, she aroused from the time she announced her candidacy in July was "what I expected. I was kind of hoping for it," she said. "I really wanted to portray the community in a different light."

Mindy Pollak

Far from being the community's official choice, Pollak faced outright hostility from some Chassidim, who feel that a woman should not be in politics. The very sight of posters with her photo was heresy to some.

This was also not unexpected, she said.

Pollak never dreamed of entering politics, she said, until she was approached by Projet Montréal, then the second opposition party. It was impressed with her groundbreaking work as co-founder of the Friends of Hutchison Street, which promotes harmonious relations between Chassidim and other residents.

A young chassidic woman teaming up with a woman twice her age and of Palestinian descent, Leila Marshy, going door to door trying to combat suspicion and misunderstanding on both sides of the cultural divide had caught the party's attention.

"At first I laughed [at the idea of running], but the more I thought about it, the more I thought I could make a difference," she said. "It was totally my decision."

Many Chassidim, a growing segment of the population, felt they needed a voice on council.

Up to election day, the community, made up of followers of various rabbinic dynasties, seemed divided, the majority appearing to favour Coderre, at least for city mayor.

Pollak did receive good wishes from the Vizhnitzer rebbe in Israel, but says that should not be interpreted as some kind of seal of approval.

While there may be matters she will consult rabbis on, Pollak is firm she is not being guided by them.

Pollak credits her British-born mother, Elka, with instilling in her an openness to other people.

Pollak's father is "Québécois," born here of Romanian parents.

All four of her grandparents were Holocaust survivors who were in the camps, she said.

A graduate of the Belz Community School, Pollak is equally articulate in English and French. She perfected her French while working as an esthetician in a spa within walking distance of her home. Most of her clients were francophones.

"I loved that job, connecting with people, helping them feel good about themselves," she said.

Pollak has reluctantly given that up for now to devote herself to being a councillor. It's work that she says "occupies my brain every minute of every single day." It's been a learning curve, and preparing the borough budget has been particularly daunting.

"People would say to me, 'You work? Really, you do that?' They're like, 'Wow'…

"We [Chassidim] need to get out of our little box to clear up the everyday misconceptions and prejudices people have."

Pollak stressed that day-to-day relations between Chassidim and non-Chassidim are good and that instances of tension that get reported distort reality. "It's a minority who make a lot of noise, and they are the ones we hear," she observed.

Friends launch Montreal women's blog site

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Lisa Brookman and Elizabeth Wiener have been best friends since their teenage years.

But neither West Islander would have imagined that WiseWomenMontreal.com, a free women's blog site they launched last Labour Day weekend, would result in their being recognized on the street.

But that's what is happening.

Brookman, a clinical psychotherapist, and Wiener, a teacher and professional style expert, have already made three appearances on Breakfast Television Montreal, with more scheduled.

And as of a few weeks ago, the site had recorded 18,000 "page views," which is considered impressive.

The site's slogan is: "Everyday wisdom for an extraordinary life."

It has all come about as the result of Brookman's brainchild about a year ago: create a Montreal-specific blog site for women that would bring together a large team of expert women bloggers – almost 30 in all – filing regularly on a range of subjects within their expertise that women care about, thereby eliminating the need to troll the web.

"We see it is a one-stop shop for all resources," said Brookman, who approached Wiener to join her for their blog site adventure.

The site covers its subjects under the general headings of Health, Beauty, Lifestyle and Family.

This would include blogs on yoga, fitness, doctor's visits and sexuality (under Health); "style 101," makeup and hair tips (under Beauty); home décor, travel, and women and money (under Lifestyle); and pregnancy, parenting and single motherhood (under Family).

And there's much more. The bona fides of the experts – whether the subject is sex or Japanese sake – are all described in detail on the site.

The site also allows inquiries, suggestions, blogs by users themselves and "guest wise women" blogs.

"The whole idea has been to empower women," said Wiener, who, like Brookman, is married with three children. "And everything is at your fingertips."

The two women appear to be very different.

Brookman said she is the dreamer, full of impulsive, creative ideas, whereas Wiener is the more cautious, analytic partner, the one who tends to look more before leaping.

Yet the two seem to complement each other perfectly – "and it works," Brookman said. "We might not agree on everything right away, but we always figure things out."

Getting the site up and running, and then having it continue to run smoothly, was – and remains – a challenge they face every day: assembling the "team," attracting sponsors and supporters, using their "developers," keeping up with the latest trends, writing and editing, editing, and more editing of the blogs that keep coming in.

Brookman and Wiener have also made extensive use of their own personal contacts and social media including Facebook, Twitter, Vimeo, YouTube, Pinterest and Instagram to get the word out, build support and win a regular following. If things go their way, plans include Wisewomen blog sites in Toronto and elsewhere.

And while making Wisewomen successful has become an overarching preoccupation in their daily lives, it has also meant juggling their own careers and family lives.

"But so far, we're managing to do it," Brookman said.

Second gift from charitable foundation

Baycrest mood clinic gets $1-million gift

CJN Staff

For the second time since 2004, Baycrest Health Science's Mood and Related Disorders Clinic has received a major gift of $1 million from the Geoffrey H. Wood Foundation.

The first gift from the Toronto-based private charitable foundation provided the seed money to create the clinic, which has provided comprehensive mental health care to adults 65 and older across Ontario.

Since then, the clinic has established itself as one of Canada's leading models of care for older adults struggling with depression, stress, anxiety, chronic illness, pain and bereavement.

The new gift will be matched by an additional $1 million from the Baycrest Foundation. The funds will enable the clinic to help more vulnerable seniors across the province and conduct new research exploring the benefits of non-drug therapies such as mindfulness-based reduction and problem-solving therapy in older populations.

Dr. David Conn, vice-president of education at Baycrest, said, "we are grateful to the Wood Foundation for their generous support of this program. The new funding will allow us to serve more individuals suffering from mood disorders, utilizing a broad array of innovative interventions."

With the additional funds, the clinic will be able to hire additional staff to run extra clinics and provide problem-solving and group therapy, as well as assist with clinical research studies exploring the effectiveness of non-drug therapies for older adults with mood disorders.

The gift will also enable the clinic to increase the frequency of its tele-psychiatry consultations and follow-ups to remote and under-served areas of the province, and launch a new geriatric mental health website this year to provide educational resources to older adults and their caregivers.

Dr. Cindy Grief, medical director of the clinic, said "this is an incredible opportunity for our clinic. With the Wood Foundation's gift, we'll have the resources to explore innovative non-pharmacological approaches to seniors' mental health and expand our outreach virtually."

Frankel known for Skinnygirl products

Entrepreneur gives Toronto the skinny

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

The audience of more than 250 women was hooked the moment Bethenny Frankel walked on stage.

The New York TV reality show personality, best-selling author, entrepreneur and talk show host known for her Skinnygirl books and products, especially her Skinnygirl cocktails, is worth an estimated net of $25 million. She has been named one of the Top 100 Most Powerful Celebrities by Forbes Magazine.

"Bethenny has become a true inspiration to women around the world," the evening's co-chair, Michele Alter said at the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto event Jan. 23 held at the Park Hyatt.

In the lively question-and-answer, including tweets from social media, Frankel offered solid business tips, laughter, a little cursing and juicy stories.

Asked about her success, Frankel said, "Looking back, I was always driven and self-motivated. I remember my parents were away and I wanted to have a party but I couldn't afford it so I charged people to come to the party and pay for the alcohol. I am in the cocktail business – it was a foreshadowing.

"I was always a hustler," she added. "I grew up at the racetrack. I was at the betting windows from really early."

Shortly after graduating from the Natural Gourmet Culinary Institute, Frankel started her own company, Bethennybakes. Then, in 2005, she brought her business to television on The Apprentice: Martha Stewart, adding colour with her wit, wisdom and humour. In 2008, she joined the cast of Bravo's Real Housewives of New York City and with her rising celebrity status, has taken the stage as host of her own talk show, Bethenny.

At the UJA event moderated by TV personality Liza Fromer, no question was off limits except about Frankel's personal life.

So, what drives Frankel? "Good enough isn't good enough with anything. I am a perfectionist. I have a huge attention to detail and organization. I would rather not do it if I can't do it well. It is about ideas, great ideas and executing them."

When asked if her life has been on a fated path, Frankel responded, "Totally. I love that phrase. You have to be aware of the signs. In the car, you're on the road, but you don't know when you are going to see the signs and what's going to happen, but you must be aware of them, and I am very aware. I'm romantic that way – I like the story. You can see things in front of you and grab them and turn them into opportunities. I like embracing the way life happens."

Frankel then shared her "secret sauce": "I work from my gut, from my instinct. Sometimes you have to listen to other people, the experts, but ultimately you have to make your own informed decision. Everyone told me that the 'cocktail' was not going to happen, and I just knew it was a good idea. You just have to know and go."

How does she handle the press, both good and bad? "In waves. The more success you have, the more people want to find something wrong. It's cliché but they want to tear you down. It rolls off my back at this point."

Frankel shared the experience of being a mother and how she manages to balance motherhood and business. Her daughter, Bryn, is three years old.

"I love the purity, the innocence and the hope. I love the fact that the only thing that Bryn has to do every day is enjoy her life and be happy. It's my job to provide that.

"I'm on a tight schedule, but the minute the set is done, I get in the car and pick up Bryn. We go for pizza, or go ice-skating, or to the playground. I have a playroom at the studio – you just make it work."

Lisa Draper, 2014 UJA campaign co-chair, announced that the annual campaign has raised more than $52.3 million from 16,000 donors. "This represents an increase of over 5.3 per cent over last year," she said. "However… we still have more people to reach in our community."

The evening concluded with two guests winning a draw to Bethenny's New York City talk show, followed by a dessert reception.

Moscovitch not worried about terrorism

Moscovitch said he's not nervous about terrorism, despite concerns some have expressed since an Islamic militant group claimed responsibility for two recent suicide bombings in Volgograd and threatened via video to strike Sochi during the Olympic Games, and the fact that security officials have been hunting for three potential suicide bombers, including one they believe may already be stationed in Sochi.

"The way I see it, is the Olympics draw in the top winter athletes from around the world, and the host country brings in the best of the best to protect us," he said. "That's their job, and they're going to do absolutely everything possible to keep us safe. And I think they will do a good job at that."

He said all Olympics have their threats no matter where they're hosted, although he admitted some places have more serious threats than others. But that's not going to stop him from competing.

"I'm not going to be naive about it, but at the same time, I won't spend time worrying about it. I'm going there to do a job," he said.

He said the hardest part of competing is staying in the moment.

"No matter how trained you are, when you go to step foot on the ice and they call your name, anything can happen," he said. "With that much pressure and excitement and adrenaline, your mind can go in any direction."

To overcome that challenge, Moscovitch is treating the Olympics like any other competition.

"I hope I can bask in the Olympic energy and feeling before and after [the routine]," he said. "If there's a little bit of added Olympic energy, that's great and I'll use that, but I don't want it to feel very different [from] anything I've done in my career."

Excavating the City of David

Past Forward
Alex Gropper

The City of David is arguably the most important piece of real estate in the history of the Jewish People. It has been excavated numerous times by various scholars over the last century and a half. It has produced some astounding discoveries and stirred up some heated controversy.

A number of well-known excavations have sifted its soil in the last 50 years. The first of these was headed by Dame Kathleen Kenyon, the legendary British archeologist, in the early 1960s. Kenyon's excavations had a strong Canadian connection. Her associate director was A. Douglas Tushingham, the chief archeologist of the Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto.

Kenyon and Tushingham had first worked together at the legendary site of Jericho in the early 1950s, and they had come up with some spectacular discoveries. They showed that Jericho had been one of the earliest settlements in the world, with a history that stretched back over 10,000 years. The dig was controversial in that it challenged the biblical account of Joshua's destruction producing no evidence whatsoever of this iconic event.

It was at Jericho that Kenyon introduced the method of excavation that bears her name and that of the great Scottish archeologist, Sir Mortimer Wheeler, with whom Kenyon had worked and whose technique she adapted to the Middle East. It was a technique that stressed meticulous excavation principles coupled with scientific methodology and precision recording of finds in a stratigraphic context. One could also argue that it was the excavation of Jericho, and the ROM's participation in it, that sparked an interest in Near Eastern biblical archeology across Canada, thanks to the intensive coverage of the excavation by the Canadian press.

It was to the City of David in Jerusalem that Kenyon and Tushingham next turned their attention, hoping to come up with discoveries that would match the scope of those they had made at Jericho. Unfortunately that was not to be.

The Wheeler-Kenyon method was challenged by Jerusalem's rough, hilly and rocky terrain. But even more of a challenge was to be provided by the political climate of the Middle East. The Six Day War broke out in 1967 ensnaring the expedition in its tentacles and forcing Kathleen Kenyon to halt the excavations.

Excavations at the City of David resumed in the late 1970s. The man who was to be in charge was the great Israeli archeologist, Yigael Yadin, who had excavated the legendary site of Masada in the early 1960s and was now the head of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem's Institute of Archaeology, the foremost school of archeology in Israel. But Yadin had the foresight to realize that these excavations would need a young, vigorous excavator to lead them.

He chose his former student, Yigal Shiloh, to head the new excavations at the City of David and to confront the daunting challenge that they would present. Shiloh proved to be up to the challenge and made some spectacular discoveries that would rewrite the early history of Jerusalem.

The strong and steadfast women of yore

Midrashic Moments
Rachael Turkienicz

The Torah readings at this time of year are some of the most intriguing and defining of the year. The Israelites are standing at Sinai experiencing Divine revelation and we are simultaneously facing our greatest and our worst moment.

Revelation with God is the culmination of a long-awaited covenant that begins with our ancestors. Through family angst, national wars, kidnapping, exile and the torture of slavery, the vision of a personal meeting with God is the fulfilment of the hopes of generations of Israelites. Standing at Mount Sinai is the experience of that long-awaited moment.

At the same time, Israel is frightened by Moses' absence and quickly reverts back to the devil it knows: Egyptian ritual. The former slaves must have assumed that their leader has disappeared along with the invisible God and they must create a new one or perish. The mob turns to Aaron, Moses' brother, and demands that he fashion a god to lead them.

Aaron instructs them to take the gold from their wives and bring it to him. The sages in the midrash inform us that it was the men who approached Aaron, and when he sent them back to their wives to get the gold, the women refused. These ancient women stood adamantly against idolatry and refused to participate or to enable their men.

Long after the incident of the golden calf, Israel is taught how to properly build a place of worship, the Tabernacle. When the Torah describes how to construct this holy place, the outer walls of the Tabernacle are made of curtains that will all be attached one to the other. The Hebrew in the Torah describes these curtains as joined "each woman to her sister."

The beautiful image is created honouring the female that preserved the holiness of monotheism against the lure of the golden calf. The Torah represents to us a powerful image of women standing arm in arm, strengthening the frame of the Tabernacle.

According to the Talmud, women were rewarded for the steadfast faith they displayed at Mount Sinai. Originally, the first day of each Hebrew month, Rosh Chodesh, was designated for the 12 tribes of Israel. Each tribe was to have its own particular Rosh Chodesh. As a result of the sin of the golden calf, the Divine plan shifted and the women were given all the days of Rosh Chodesh.

Once a year, on Shavuot, we celebrate that moment at Mount Sinai when we received the Torah. But on every Rosh Chodesh, we celebrate a day meant to pay homage to every Jewish woman.

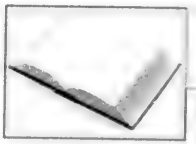
Open your eyes to daily miracles

Rabbi David Seed



Rabbinic Reflections

I don't think I need to tell anyone how difficult this winter has been thus far. At the same time, the experience has brought to light two terms that have now become part of our vocabulary. The first, "polar vortex," describes the unusual movement of the polar air in a southerly direction, giving us the prolonged, frigid weather we've been having. The other is less familiar, because it describes a rare phenomenon we've encountered – "cryoseism."

Also called an ice quake or freeze quake, cryoseism comes from the words "cryo" meaning cold and "seism," which refers to a shaking of the earth. Simply put, when the water in the rock and earth freezes due to abnormally low temperatures and then expands, it causes loud bangs and noises, usually in the middle of the night. Many people have called the police, worried about possible intruders. They became frightened at what they were hearing, not knowing its cause. However, once we understood the reasons behind this unusual activity, everyone was finally relieved the next time they heard these strange noises in the night.

But it got me thinking: does the fact that we now understand these rare events make them any less special, or, I might dare say, miraculous? We read of miracles in the Torah, especially in the portions of the past weeks – the 10 plagues, the splitting of the sea, the giving of the Ten Commandments on Mount Sinai. How do we account for them? According to some, there are scientific explanations for each of them, parts of nature that came together to create these events in the way they did. For others, it's sufficient to know that God is behind these happenings. They have no need for science to explain why these took place. They are simply manifestations of the great power and wonders of the Almighty.

However, even if we can explain some of the more unusual episodes of the Torah or even that of a cryoseism, does that mean there are no miracles at all, either then or now? On the other hand, do the explanations make any of them less miraculous?

In our prayer book, we recite in each Amidah the following" "We thank You and praise You morning, noon and night for Your miracles which daily attend us and for Your wondrous kindnesses."

What does our tradition mean by this? Where are these miracles that attend us daily? Who has seen them? In this phrase, simple yet profound, I believe that we are being taught that life and all it contains, from the time we wake in the morning until we lay our heads down at night, everything can be seen as a miracle if only we learn to appreciate all the gifts given to us each day. Understanding the reasoning behind any event does not have to diminish the miraculous nature of our world and our lives. All we need do is to open our eyes and then live accordingly.

We have truly come a long way

From the Bimah

Rabbi Philip Scheim

One of the more interesting sets of books in my library is an edition of a classical Torah commentary authored by the eminent scholar Rabbi Baruch HaLevi Epstein, known as the Torah Temimah. Originally published in Lithuania in 1902, each book of the Torah has its own small volume, including the Torah text, the commentary of Rashi and Rabbi Epstein's Torah Temimah commentary alongside. As is often the case with such editions of the Torah, at the back of each volume is a small-print edition of the Shabbat service, so that one could manage to daven and follow the Torah reading with the same easy-to-hold volume.

A fascinating feature of this edition is the text of the blessing for the government. In this case, it's a blessing for the Czar, and it begins as follows: "He who gives salvation to kings and authority to princes, may He bless and protect His Majesty Czar Nicolas Alexandrovitch, his wife, mother and children [all mentioned by name]."

What's remarkable about this text, which was recited in synagogues throughout pre-revolutionary Russia, is the fact that Jews were praying for the welfare of a ruler who did little to stop the Kishinev pogrom and numerous other examples of virulent anti-Semitism. This prayer clearly was recited not out of love, not with kavanah, not with sincere intent, but out of obligation and fear.

I hadn't thought of this text for years, but was reminded of it last month, when I was privileged to be part of the delegation accompanying Prime Minister Stephen Harper on his official visit to Israel. It occurred to me how, not so long ago, national leaders were not our friends, and any expression of loyalty and prayers for their well-being may have masked our true feelings. It occurred to me how far we had come in history, in the progression of the Jewish People, when we could be in the company of a leader for whom any prayer we would be reciting would come from the depths of our heart, with full kavanah, with deep feeling and emotion. How far we had come!

Harper's speech to the Knesset and his subsequent remarks to reporters and words spoken throughout his four days in Israel reflected his feeling that the existence, continued strength and vitality of the State of Israel is a manifestation of justice in the world and a centuries-long-overdue undoing of the wrongs of history, when Jews were denied their own land.

Our experience in Israel with the prime minister reminded all of our Canadian delegation of how far we have come in having a leader who stands up against much of the world and many forces at home, in support of that which lies so close to our hearts – our beloved State of Israel. That we have a leader who, likewise, holds Israel close to his heart, brings to mind our traditional expression of gratitude to the Almighty, who has kept us, as a people, alive, sustained us, and brought us to this profoundly encouraging moment in history.

Settlement issue spurs coalition tensions

David Berlin
Special to The CJN

Ever since the leader of Israel's Communist party, Meir Vilner, popularized the phrase "Yisrael, Palesteen: shtei medinot leshtei amim" ("Israel Palestine; two states for two peoples") in the late 1970s, the idea of two states for two people – better known as " the two-state solution" – has been understood to mean two ethnically/culturally homogenous nation- states sharing the land west of the Jordan River.

Analysis

On this view, Israel – which is mostly Jewish, but includes 1.3 million Arabs – would in the future co-exist alongside Palestine, which would be home to both Christians and Muslim Arabs. More recently, the ethnic/cultural purity of Israel has been zealously pursued by the Russian-born Israeli foreign minister, Avigdor Liberman, who has declared that any final-status agreement must include large land swaps in which Arab-Israeli towns such as Umm el Fahm in the Northern Galilee would be annexed to the future Palestinian state, even as Jewish settlements in the West Bank would be threaded to produce a new Israeli map.

Liberman's numerous provocations have incensed Arab-Israeli leaders and helped undermine the loyalty of many Arab citizens of Israel who have lived under Israeli rule since the establishment of the state in 1948. Especially hurt and enraged is the Druze population, whose sons not only serve in the IDF, but have been instrumental in the formation of some of the IDF's most formidable units, including the legendary Shaked reconnaissance unit in which I had the honour of serving.

Naftali Bennett, leader of Israel's third-largest political party, the Jewish Home, was ushered into office largely on the basis of his declaration that the Zionist pioneer's dream of Israel as a secular cosmopolitan state is dead and that Israelis, including old-school Israelis, should replace Theodor Herzl's multicultural fantasy with the dominant view of Israel as a Jewish homeland. Over the course of his campaign, Bennett castigated ultra-Orthodox Jews for spoiling Judaism for their secular counterparts. Judaism, Bennett claimed, needed to remain a big tent receptive to Jews of all stripes. After the 2012 election, in which his upstart party won 12 seats, Bennett joined the Likud-led coalition, believing that, like him, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had eschewed or never really bought into Herzl's idea of Israel as a commonwealth of diverse cultures.

When Netanyahu publicly suggested that a final-status agreement might see some remote Jewish settlements remaining under Palestinian rule, Bennett was caught entirely off guard. For a moment, the young leader (Bennett is 41) must have wondered whether the prime minister was in fact abandoning the idea of Jewish unity. If that were the case, Bennett, who had once been Netanyahu's chief of staff, would not tolerate it.

Netanyahu, Kerry chat after public criticism

JTA

JERUSALEM— Benjamin Netanyahu and John Kerry discussed the developing framework agreement in a telephone call hours after the Israeli prime minister accused the U.S. secretary of state of promoting a boycott in a speech.

The two leaders spoke on Sunday night, Ha'aretz reported. The newspaper cited unnamed senior U.S. officials as saying the conversation dealt mostly with the framework agreement. The conversation came after Kerry met earlier on Sunday with Israeli Justice Minister and chief Israeli peace negotiator Tzipi Livni, and negotiator Isaac Molho.

Earlier on Sunday, Netanyahu, and other Israeli government officials, rapped Kerry for warning that Israel would face more international boycotts if the peace process fails, during an address to the Munich Security Conference.

Netanyahu called boycotts "immoral and unjust." He also said that boycotts push the peace process further away by causing the Palestinians "to adhere to their intransigent positions," and that "no pressure will cause me to concede the vital interests of the State of Israel, especially the security of Israel's citizens."

The U.S. State Department responded to the criticism levelled at Kerry.

"Secretary Kerry has a proud record of over three decades of steadfast support for Israel's security and well-being, including staunch opposition to boycotts," State Department spokesperson Jen Psaki said in a statement Sunday. "Secretary Kerry has always expected opposition and difficult moments in the process, but he also expects all parties to accurately portray his record and statements."

Kerry is expected to introduce his framework agreement proposal to the mostly stalled U.S.-brokered Israeli-Palestinian peace talks in the coming weeks.

Transfer of settlement funds halted

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel's finance minister halted the transfer of state funds to the settlements following a television report that the money was being misused.

Yair Lapid reportedly stopped the transfers on Saturday while the allegations in a report on Israel Channel 2 the previous night are being investigated.

According to the report, more than $42 million given to the settlements by the previous government to offset losses from a West Bank construction freeze were used inappropriately, specifically by being transferred to the settlers' Yesha Council for advocacy purposes.

Lapid called on those investigating the issue – including the head of the budget division, the accountant general and the legal adviser – to submit their conclusions in a week, Ha'aretz reported. Channel 2 reported that the settlements received the money in secret payments as compensation for losing out on city taxes from houses that were not built during the 10-month settlement building freeze that ended in September 2010.

Thousands of housing construction starts were delayed during the freeze. The funds were transferred as "security grants," according to Channel 2.

"In light of reports that those same funds are not serving their original purpose, such as security and school and kindergarten maintenance, but are being transferred in an allegedly illegal way to the Settlers' Council, which uses them for political ends, some of which contravene government policies, the finance minister has ordered an immediate freeze on future payments," the statement Saturday night from the Finance Ministry said. Likud Party government minister Yuval Steinitz, who served as finance minister when the payments were authorized, confirmed that the payments were made on orders of the Prime Minister's Office, the Times of Israel reported.

Public apology demanded

And rather than clarify matters with Netanyahu, Bennett took an opportunity on Jan. 29 to lash out publicly and in a manner that reminded some Israeli pundits of his campaign faux pas in which this inexperienced leader and former army officer declared that if he were ordered to evacuate settlers, he would disobey orders. That outburst unhinged a large swath of Bennett's supporters and moved his party from second position behind front-running Likud to third behind Yair Lapid's Yesh Atid. This latest outburst, some journalists speculated, could cost Bennett his seat in cabinet.

Indeed, Netanyahu's office demanded a public apology, which Bennett withheld for a while and finally offered without ever backing off his substantive criticism. In private, Bennett spoke of Netanyahu's position as a hoax aimed at riling the Palestinian leadership and showing U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry, who has been preparing to present an American "framework" for a peace deal, just how committed to resolving the conflict he is.

Bennett has said that if Netanyahu were to declare his support for an American initiative that calls for a Palestinian state to be established along the 1967 borders with east Jerusalem as its capital, he would quit the coalition. Two of Netanyahu's other coalition partners, Justice Minister Tzipi Livni and Lapid, the finance minister, would likely leave the government if Netanyahu doesn't continue to support the American initiative.

The notion that settlers could and would remain under Palestinian rule is not new. In the run-up to the 2005 disengagement from Gaza, several settler leaders declared their unconditional commitment to the Holy Land. Jewish settlers in the Gush Katif bloc in southern Gaza served the Israeli government with several major petitions insisting on their right to stay put. Then-prime minister Ariel Sharon shrugged them off.

In the West Bank, a small group of settlers in the Gush Etzion region have adopted the strategy made famous by the ultra-Orthodox teachings of recently departed Rabbi Menachem Froman, who argued that Orthodox Jews should not defer to ephemeral political arrangements and must remain steadfastly committed to the Promised Land. Rabbi Froman went so far as to broker a draft agreement with Hamas that permitted Jewish settlers to remain true to this most profound conviction.

Johansson, Oxfam part ways

JTA

Actor Scarlett Johansson ended her relationship with Oxfam following a protracted debate over her role as spokesperson for the Israeli company SodaStream.

In a statement Jan. 29, Johansson said she and the humanitarian organization have "a fundamental difference of opinion in regards to the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement" against Israel. SodaStream, which manufactures home soda makers, operates a factory in the West Bank settlement of Ma'aleh Adumim.

Scarlett Johansson (Wikimedia Commons)

Johansson has served as a global ambassador for Oxfam for eight years, travelling to India, Sri Lanka and Kenya on its behalf to highlight the problem of global poverty.

"She is very proud of her accomplishments and fundraising efforts during her tenure with Oxfam," said the statement released by her spokesperson.

In its own statement, released Jan. 30, Oxfam said that while it "respects the independence of our ambassadors, Ms. Johansson's role promoting the company SodaStream is incompatible with her role as an Oxfam global ambassador.

It added: "Oxfam believes that businesses, such as SodaStream, that operate in settlements further the ongoing poverty and denial of rights of the Palestinian communities that we work to support. Oxfam is opposed to all trade from Israeli settlements, which are illegal under international law."

SodaStream signed Johansson to be its first global brand ambassador, and she appeared in a U.S. television ad for the company during the Super Bowl. The company employs Israeli and Palestinian workers at its West Bank factory.

Pro-Palestinian groups had called on Oxfam to sever its ties with the actor.

On Jan. 28, representatives of Jewish Voice for Peace, the Boston Coalition for Palestinian Rights, American Jews for a Just Peace and the First Church in Cambridge Israel/Palestine Task Team met at Oxfam America's Boston headquarters and urged the humanitarian organization to drop Johansson, who is Jewish, over her defence of SodaStream's presence in the West Bank.

Johansson defended SodaStream and her involvement with the company in a statement released Jan. 24 on the Huffington Post.

Montreal director's Shoah doc up for Oscar Award

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

Montreal director Malcolm Clarke thought that some people might consider Alice Herz-Sommer controversial for being "thankful" – her word – for a very long life that included living through the Holocaust.

Clarke's remarkable, Oscar-nominated documentary short, The Lady in Number 6: Music Saved My Life, reveals Herz-Sommer, now 110 and the world's oldest known Holocaust survivor, to be a person who never let the Holocaust dampen her optimistic spirit and who survived her ordeal through her love of music.

The British-born Clarke, a non-Jew who has lived in Quebec since the mid-1990s, told The CJN he was "quite shocked" when he first heard Herz-Sommer express gratitude for everything she's lived through.

But filming her in her small London apartment "Number 6," accompanied by Montreal producer Frederic Bohbot and a film crew, he realized that despite her positive attitude toward life, she understood Nazi evil all too well.

Clarke told The CJN that while she appreciated that there may have been Nazis who loved Beethoven, Herz-Sommer "held no illusions about the horrors that took place." She felt that such love "would not redeem what they did one bit."

Clarke spoke briefly with The CJN after the Jan. 27 screening of his 38-minute film, which was followed by a panel discussion organized by the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (MHMC) as part of International Holocaust Remembrance Day. Panellists included psychologist Henry Greenspan and survivors Rena Schondorf, Ted Bolgar and Jean Kutscher.

Clarke, an Oscar winner for a previous short documentary, You Don't Have to Die (1989), and for the feature-length documentary Prisoner of Paradise (2002), which was also Holocaust-themed, described to the MHMC audience how he "gussied up" more than 12 hours of interview footage of Herz-Sommer, taken over a four-day period, with archival material, to construct The Lady in Number 6.

He said the film took about a year and a half to complete and premiered in London three months ago.

Filming was the easy part, Clarke said, given Herz-Sommer's irrepressible nature and readiness to speak about anything and everything – particularly her love of music.

"All we had to do was stand to one side," he said.

Clarke confessed that he was initially reluctant to make another Holocaust-related film after Prisoner of Paradise, which was about a Jewish cabaret artist who performed in the Nazis' "show camp" Theresienstadt, and had required Clarke to pore over archival material for countless hours.

But once he met Herz-Sommer during a stop-off in London a few years ago, he realized her story had to be told.

"I knew I had been hooked."

As in Prisoner of Paradise, Theresienstadt plays a central role in The Lady in Number 6. It's where the Prague-born Herz-Sommer – then a 39-year-old accomplished concert pianist from a home frequented by Franz Kafka and Gustav Mahler – was taken in 1943 with her husband, Leopold, and young son, Raphael. Her husband would later die in another camp, while her son died years after the war at age 64.

In the concentration camp, as Herz-Sommer says in the film, she managed to perform 100 concerts, including all of the Chopin Études.

Even some Nazi soldiers would listen in. It was not for the "entertainment," she explains, "but as moral support" for the internees, most of whom would eventually be deported to the Auschwitz death camp.

Alice Herz-Sommer is the world's oldest known Holocaust survivor.

Despite the hardships in the camp, music was Herz-Sommer's salvation – "my God," as she puts it – keeping her spirit unbowed. In the film, she utters the word "music" many times, as if it were a mantra.

Clarke said even though he never saw an "irritable" side of her, Herz-Sommer doesn't view her past "through rose-tinted glasses."

Yet, despite the evil she witnessed and endured, she never lost the capacity to see the humanity of individual Germans.

"She is just one of those odd people who refuses to allow experience to grind her down," Clarke said.

In the film, she is seen practising pieces by Bach and other composers on her apartment piano, her fingers slowed a bit, but her technique intact.

While Herz-Sommer has "slowed down" a little since the film was made, Clarke said she still lives alone, plays Scrabble with friends, and practises piano every day.

Producer Nicholas Reed is also up for an Oscar along with Clarke.

The Prime Ministers

Members of Bnei Akiva attended a special screening of The Prime Ministers at Cineplex Empress Walk in Toronto recently. Based on Israeli diplomat's Yehuda Avner's best-selling book, The Prime Ministers takes the audience inside the offices of Israel's prime ministers through the eyes of an insider. Consul General of Israel DJ Schneeweiss was among the 350 people in attendance.

Hollywood glitterati take to 'super cool' Lazypants

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Admit it. After a long day, all you want to do when you get home is kick back and relax, maybe catch an episode of Breaking Bad, shed your work duds, whether a business suit or something a little less formal, and put on something comfortable.

Like maybe sweatpants, a sweatshirt, and those comfy socks that might have a hole or two but are just what you need to make the ensemble complete.

Adam Bledin, 30, knows exactly where you're coming from. He's been there himself.

Back when he was in high school and facing a late-day gym class, he was more likely to head home, watch an episode of The Fresh Prince of Bel-Air, lying on the couch in his sweatpants. Pretty soon, he got to calling them his "lazy pants," for good reason.

The name stuck with him over the years, and later as a businessman, he introduced a line of denim jeans with a throwaway line of sweatpants that he called – what else – Lazypants.

The thing is, Lazypants proved to be the bigger seller of the two. They were so big that he parlayed that consumer preference into a highly successful line of casual apparel under the Lazypants label.

Featuring his trademark and uncluttered three-bird logo and super comfortable Turkish fabric, the sweatpants proved a hit – so much so that some of the beautiful people in Hollywood have been seen wearing the product, providing a kind of advertising that only a ton of money could buy.

Celebrities such as reality show star Kourtney Kardashian, actress Mila Kunis, model Alessandra Ambrosio, actress Naya Rivera, comedian Martin Short and actor Billy Baldwin have been spotted wearing Lazypants.

The apparel was sold out of a trendy Los Angeles boutique called Kitson and gave proof to the slogan, "Sweatpants are super cool," said Bledin.

Where sweatpants were once seen primarily on those working out or lounging about, today people – mostly women and young girls – are happy to don the apparel when they're out and about, said Bledin.

"This is a product that everybody likes," he said. "It's all about comfort, softness. And there was an open market space."

Bledin speculates that's what accounts for the difference in success between the sweatpants and the denim line, which fizzled owing to a saturated marketplace.

Sweatpants are another matter entirely. It was a niche that did not have nearly as many retail options. And they were a perfect item for the times, in which economic stresses have led more people to stay at home and relax in comfortable attire.

As an entrepreneur with a sense of style and design, he put together his own line that has taken the market by storm. His catch line: "Why sweat when you can be lazy?"

In his first year in business, Bledin sold 600 units. Last year, sales reached 280,000. That's a rate of growth over 18 months that makes you do a double take.

In addition to sweatpants, the Lazypants line includes hoodies, hats, kids clothes, blankets, shorts and crew-neck sweaters. Prices range from $78 to $138 for pants and $118 to $148 for hoodies.

"It's a prestige price," Bledin acknowledged. "We're right at the bottom of prestige." High-end designers sweatpants can sell for as much as $1,600, he pointed out.

Lazypants has a growing Canadian presence. The company retained the Slavins Agency to place the products in Canadian retail outlets. So far, Lazypants apparel is carried by TNT, Sporting Life, North by Northwest and Honey. Retailers outside Toronto also carry their product, and the company even had a store in Kuwait order 1,000 pieces.

"They sold out and ordered more," said Bledin. "We can't keep up with demand."

Teenage girls and young women are the main demographic for sales. At bar and bat mitzvahs, they've proven to be highly sought-after giveaways, and a number of summer camps have stocked up on the items, adding their own logos to make them distinctive, Bledin added.

"Our main focus now is more the United Stated," he continued. "The possibilities are endless, really."

Helping him navigate all this uncharted territory is Fraser Kitson Ross, the founder of the Los Angeles store that bears his name.

Ross is a Canadian who opened Ice Boutique on Cumberland Avenue in Toronto's trendy Yorkville area in 1989. He closed the store in 2004. Bledin said he and Ross have a rapport, based in part on their Canadian backgrounds. Ross is his mentor who helps him with his business decisions.

Kitson is continuing to open stores across the United States and is a go-to place for "celebrity shopping destination, and Lazypants is a featured brand." Bledin expects Lazypants to be available in Portland, Los Angeles and Las Vegas by March.

Sales could reach $3 million to $5 million this year: "I think it's achievable in every way," he said. "We're at the point of looking at a strategic investor," someone with the capital to put into the company, but who's also familiar with the industry and who could lend their expertise to the enterprise.

After that, who knows? Perhaps expansion to Japan, Australia, South Korea or Russia. The sky is the limit.

Not bad for a guy who used to enjoy lounging on his couch in the comfort of his lazy pants.

Biography of Forward editor does great service

The Rise of Abraham Cahan
Seth Lipsky
(Nextbook/Schocken)

Reviewed by Bill Gladstone

Ninety years ago, New York newspaper editor Abraham Cahan was at the epicentre of international Jewish affairs – not a newsmaker himself – but an opinion-maker, someone who had an extraordinary and powerful influence on the Jewish masses in New York, around the Diaspora and in pre-state Israel.

As editor of the The Daily Yiddish Forwerts (Forward) from 1902 to the postwar era, Cahan saw The Forwerts' circulation rise from a measly 6,000 to an astonishing 250,000 by about 1924. In the teens and '20s he traveled to Europe and Jewish Palestine and met with Jewish and world leaders, most of whom appreciated the awesome power he wielded with his Yiddish typewriter.

Born in Lithuania in 1860, Cahan did not learn English until after he arrived in America in his early 20s, yet he also managed to distinguish himself in the sphere of Jewish literature. Embracing the modern trend of realism, he crafted numerous stories about Jewish life in America for major magazines and attracted the attention of leading critics such as William Dean Howells, who became his champion. Cahan's masterpiece, The Rise of David Levinsky, was published in 1917 and remains an outstanding example of American Jewish immigrant fiction.

Seth Lipsky, a knowledgeable insider who founded the modern-day English-language version of The Forward, has written a well-researched and nicely balanced biography of his illustrious predecessor.

Since I am intrigued by the Jewish immigrant experience in America and by Cahan in particular, I was delighted to discover this book and especially that Lipsky was its author. My high expectations were not disappointed. Seemingly effortlessly, Lipsky recreates the world of our immigrant ancestors of a century ago and brings to life their cares, concerns and political issues as Cahan himself would have perceived them.

Lipsky's preface opens with this sentence: "A portrait of Abraham Cahan is the first thing that greets a visitor to The Forward in New York City."

Full disclosure: I have written many pieces for The Forward and once met Lipsky in the Forward's office, under that very portrait if memory serves.

Cahan served an early stint at The Forwerts in the 1890s but left because, although a socialist and strongly pro-union, he wasn't willing to toe the paper's dry, ideological socialist line. He spent five years at a thriving New York paper, The Commercial Advertiser, serving under the famed muck-raking journalist-editor Lincoln Steffens. When Cahan requested assignments that would bring him in close contact with life, Steffens assigned him to the police headquarters on Mulberry Street, which immersed him in the street life of the Lower East Side.

Cahan was told to call in large breaking news stories from a pay phone. The first time he did so, he found a public telephone in a drugstore but needed help because he had never used a phone before. Cahan wrote many stories about Jewish life on the Lower East Side for The Commercial Advertiser, all necessary fodder for his fiction.

In 1902 The Forwerts lured him back as editor, granting him a free hand without interference because the paper was in danger of folding. Cahan's first decree was that writers drop their pretentious high-falutin' Yiddish for a more popular, street-level variety. He also broadened the paper's scope beyond its narrow socialist worldview. "I have been in the outside world, I have discovered that we, the socialists, have no patent on honesty and knowledge," he said. "The outside world is more tolerant of us than we are of it."

Socialists, he added, needed to know something about the world beyond the Lower East Side. "It's as important to teach people to carry a handkerchief in their pockets as it is to carry a union card. And it's as important to respect the opinions of others as it is to have opinions of one's own."

His populist reforms were an instant hit and the paper's circulation tripled to about 19,000 within four months. Shortly after the Kishinev pogrom of 1905, New York's Jewish community reached one million, so there was still plenty of room for growth. Cahan's objective was to help the masses of newly-arrived Jewish immigrants better acclimatize themselves to life in America.

When readers sent him letters detailing their personal problems, Cahan realized the letters were a "Godsend." He established The Bintel Brief, a daily advice column that became immensely popular. The circulation continued to skyrocket.

In 1921 Cahan hired the great Yiddish writer Israel Joshua Singer as his Warsaw correspondent and later serialized his wildly popular novel The Brothers Ashkenazi. I. J. Singer joined The Forwert's staff upon reaching America in 1934. A year later his lesser-known brother Isaac Bashevis Singer came to New York and also began working for the paper. Forty-three years later, in 1978, Isaac Bashevis won the Nobel Prize in literature for stories that first appeared in The Forwerts.

Lipsky details Cahan's bitter battles with the playwright Jacob Gordin and the novelist Sholem Asch, also his meetings with Chaim Weizmann, David Ben-Gurion, Alfred Dreyfus, Vladimir Lenin, the Belzer Rebbe and other important figures. He also recounts Cahan's politics: he was pro-German regarding World War I until America entered the conflict. Not until the 1917 Russian Revolution did Cahan (and the Jewish world in general) throw its support overwhelmingly towards the Allies, Lipsky writes, mainly because a German victory would have threatened the socialist gains of the Russian Revolution as well as democracy in Europe.

Like many Jews, Cahan was initially lukewarm towards the Balfour Declaration of 1917, and only belatedly aligned himself more fully with the Zionists, apologizing for his earlier harsh criti-cisms. In the late '30s, however, he was unflinchingly anti-Fascist and anti-Nazi, calling the Munich Agreement of 1938 a "shameful document" and describing Hitler as the "fascist devil" who "made a fool of his terrified opponents, of the democratic countries, and of the whole civilized world." His oft-stated wish late in life was to outlive Hitler and see his downfall– "I don't care what happens to me after that," he reportedly said.

When he died in August 1951, his funeral attracted some 10,000 people to the streets around the newspaper's building on East Broadway; the service was broadcast on loudspeakers.

Lipsky has done a great service in re-kindling the memory of this American Jewish colossus with such intelligence, discernment – and the sort of direct, inviting prose of which Cahan himself would have heartily approved.

LITTLE-KNOWN FACTS ABOUT FILM NOIR CLASSIC

Film buffs, and especially fans of American film noir, will certainly have heard of director Jules Dassin's remarkable 1948 film The Naked City, in which actor Barry Fitzgerald plays a veteran Irish police detective in New York. The film is best-known for its line, "There are eight million stories in the naked city. This has been one of them," (later used in a popular TV show).

Less known, perhaps, is the fact that several important Jewish actors appear in uncredited small roles in the film. Yiddish stage and screen actors Celia Adler and Molly Picon are the manager of a dress shop and operator of a beverage stall respectively. David Opatoshu and Nehemiah Persoff also appear briefly in the film – it was Persoff's first screen appearance.

Additionally, the film was said to have been inspired by a 1945 book of photographs titled Naked City by famed New York crime photographer Weegee (Arthur Fellig) and was based on a story by Marvin Wald. Producer Mark Hellinger, who narrated, was a high-powered journalist and screenwriter who died before the film was released. The film won Academy Awards for cinematography and editing.

Montreal singer picks up Grammy Award

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Montreal singer/songwriter Jennifer Gasoi won a Grammy for best children's album at the annual awards ceremony Jan.26

Her achievement is especially remarkable because she is an independent artist and her winning album Throw a Penny in the Wishing Well is self-produced.

Gasoi is the first Canadian to bag the best children's album prize.

"It came out of left field," said Gasoi of the news in December of her nomination. "Children's album is one of the most competitive fields, and some of the best music is coming out of that genre."

Gasoi performs an average of only about five concerts a year, but she expects that to change dramatically as invitations pour in from all over the world.

Throw a Penny in the Wishing Well is her second album. She wrote all of its 18 songs and arranged it, secured the funding and hired the best musicians she could afford.

"I really did it all on my own," said Gasoi after returning home from Los Angeles still a little breathless from keeping up with the sudden flood of interest from the media, industry and public. "It hasn't stopped... It's pretty overwhelming."

Throw a Penny was nominated for a Juno Award in Canada, as was her debut album, 2004's Songs for You, which also garnered the Parents' Choice gold award. Last year, she was shortlisted for Sirius XM's Indie Children's Artist of the Year.

Gasoi employs a wide variety of music from swing to bluegrass to calypso and, always, a little klezmer as a nod to her heritage – and it's all eminently danceable. Her work is distinctive for its intelligent lyrics performed in a voice that would be at home in a jazz club, which is why the songs appeal to adults, too.

Gasoi had a promising career as an adult jazz singer before she made the switch to younger audiences – and from her native Vancouver to Montreal.

Musical since she was a toddler, she studied classical piano for 12 years and later jazz piano, voice and composition. In Montreal, she continues to do some adult cabaret, notably at the Upstairs Jazz Bar on Mackay Street.

Gasoi studied at McGill University from 1992 to 1996, and her father, dentist Ivan Gasoi, was from Montreal, so she felt drawn to the city when she wanted to get out of her "comfort zone" on the West Coast.

She hadn't really thought about children's music – she has no kids of her own – but a young cousin and some other kids liked what she tried out on them.

"I don't talk down to children. I speak to them as equals. That's why adults also respond. There are layers of meaning in the lyrics about living the best life you can," Gasoi said.

"The littlest ones just love the music – they feel the heart and love in it."

Montreal's vibrant music scene, with its strong indie spirit and diversity also attracted her. "Montreal is a really creative city that values the arts so much... I live in the Plateau and am exposed to all kinds of musical styles and cultures here. I think by osmosis, I've incorporated a lot of that into my music."

How did she get where she is today? Gasoi unabashedly cites "hard work, perseverance and vision," and above all a belief in herself, as the attributes that have seen her through the struggling years.

Ecstatic as she was in December when nominated, Gasoi worried about what to wear to the Grammys.

Jennifer Gasoi

"It was just before Christmas and nothing was open. I really only had about three weeks," she said. She chose Westmount designer Astri Prugger, who with Gasoi's input, created a strapless, red below-the-knee-length gown, with corsage appliqués across its flouncy skirt.

"It has a vintage feel," said the brunette Gasoi. "It evokes my jazz background."

Stripped-down video performance at the Koffler

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

A woman stands naked on the shore of the Mediterranean Sea, spinning a hula hoop. The hoop, however, is made of barbed wire that bruises her chest. As the woman rotates her body to keep the hoop up, we grimace at how painful it must be for her to avoid the hoop's jagged edges.

To visual artist Sigalit Landau, who stripped down to record herself for this video performance called Barbed Hula, the space within the hoop is one of freedom as well as restriction. Landau says her performance is symbolic of learning to live within the borders of a country like Israel.

"My videos are very much mirroring things in me," Landau said in an email from her home in Tel Aviv. "I only [perform] if there is suffering involved... no one should suffer for my art but me."

Landau is one of Israel's most internationally renowned artists. Her video works are the focus of her first solo exhibition in Canada, Moving to Stand Still, which runs at the Koffler Gallery in Toronto from Feb. 6 to April 6.

Moving to Stand Still will feature six of Landau's most essential video artworks. The exhibit's title speaks to the constant movement of both the Jewish People throughout history and the artist at its centre. Landau was born in Jerusalem in 1969, but also spent her childhood in Philadelphia, London and parts of Quebec.

Landau began making short films to educate soldiers, when she served in the Israeli army. Although she said she prefers making installations and sculptures, film creates a whole new space of possibilities, especially when it focuses on water and the body.

In DeadSee the artist lies atop a spiral raft of 500 watermelons on the Dead Sea.

Sigalit Landau

"Video... is contemporary but has its roots in storytelling, painting, dreams," she said. "Some materials are not possible to inhabit the gallery space."

Her videos look at many current topics in Israel, such as war, agricultural exploitation and Jewish-Arab relations. One focus of her work is the history of the Jewish People in Israel and their shifting identity.

"As a people that have a history of being in exile, being thrown out and displaced... [Israeli Jews] haven't really learned to live with borders or with this very defined idea of a homeland," says Mona Filip, curator of the Koffler Gallery.

One of the videos from the exhibit that looks at borders is titled Azkelon. The name is a combination of Gaza and Ashkelon, a coastal city just north of the Gaza Strip.

In the video, three teens are on a beach, playing a game where they throw a knife into the ground and create a literal line in the sand, dividing their space from the other players' territory. It is a clear metaphor for Israel's continually shifting borders.

In another of her videos, DeadSee, Landau appears nude again, lying atop a spiral raft of 500 watermelons floating on the Dead Sea. DeadSee is one of Landau's many videos full of contrasts, Filip says.

"The [Dead Sea] is the heart of the desert," she says. "At the same time, it's the site of all this agricultural exploitation that is further endangering that place."

The irony that a sweet fruit like a watermelon can still thrive in such a salty environment is an apt metaphor for life persevering in the harshest of circumstances – a reality clear to many Israelis.

"[Israeli] society, creative as it is, diverse as it may seem, is living from one catastrophe to the next, despite the fact that for 65 years, the state exists," Landau said. "My works show in a normal way how abnormal things are getting."

Another of Landau's striking works, Salted Lake, is a tribute to her parents, who survived the Holocaust. The video focuses on boots encased in Dead Sea salt crystals, sitting on top of a frozen lake in Gdansk, Poland. Slowly, the shoes melt through the ice, a symbol for the disappearance of Jewish life in Europe.

Moving to Stand Still is the Koffler Gallery's second exhibition at Artscape Youngplace, their new home in downtown Toronto that's quickly becoming a part of the local arts circuit.

Toronto marks Landau's only North American stop on a worldwide tour that includes openings in Rome, Moscow and Johannesburg.

Music superstars set to perform in Israel

A number of international music superstars have recently announced one-off performances in Israel this spring and summer.

International pop superstar Justin Timberlake will present his first-ever performance in Israel as part of his "20/20 Experience World Tour" at Tel Aviv's Hayarkon Park on May 28.

Legendary singer/songwriter and rock icon Neil Young, along with his band Crazy Horse, will perform at Hayarkon Park on July 17. This will be his first show in Israel since 1993.

Seminal rock band The Pixies will headline a two-day music festival at Tel Aviv-Jaffa's Bloomfield Stadium on June 17, followed by a performance by Soundgarden on June 18.

"We are thrilled to host a selection of concerts by some of the world's top musical artists in Tel Aviv this year, which attests to the city's growing reputation as a hotspot for international performers," said Ami Allon, consul for tourism at the Canadian Israel Government Tourist Office.

The concerts follow performances by Rihanna and the Red Hot Chili Peppers in Israel last year.

BULLIED STUDENTS NOT ALONE

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

Joshua Miller has a message for the bullies who teased and taunted him in the schoolyard. That message is, "Thank you."

Without them, the University of Toronto student says he would not have pushed himself to start Louder Than Noise, a youth-run non-profit organization that brings together marginalized and bullied students from across Ontario.

By the time Miller was in Grade 10, he had already transferred between multiple schools due to incessant bullying. As he went through some dark days, he began writing poems and short stories, and kept a journal. The creative release energized him.

He says his thoughts then went to kids across the country struggling with the same anxiety and pain. Miller created a "poetry wall" on Facebook for student writers and musicians to post and share their art.

"This was something that I wanted to share with other youth… so they could do something that they love while helping themselves out in a supportive community," Miller told The CJN.

"I figured I would turn something that could be bad, like the Internet, especially with cyberbullying, into a positive thing."

As Miller, now 19, describes, Louder Than Noise's role is to "be a peer supportive community for bullied youth and youth who deal with mental health problems like social anxiety and depression." The youths congregate online and at a few events every year to share their passions, while defying the stigmas and labels they have been associated with.

The name comes from Miller's vision of a sound that a generation of youth makes that can rise above a singular voice, making a difference in the world.

The Thornhill, Ont. native says he continues to write poetry and short stories – that is, when there is a lag in his schedule. Beyond his work in the honours arts management program at the University of Toronto, where he is learning more about running a non-profit arts-based group like Louder Than Noise, he aspires to go into politics and journalism.

"The idea of politics and getting involved, being at the helm of making change happen… that would be a tremendous achievement and honour to be able to have," he says. Miller credits a year he spent as a City Youth Councillor, representing young people from Scarborough East, as a big learning experience.

Even though he has a learning disability, Miller finished high school as an Ontario Scholar. In 2013, Youth in Motion selected him as one of Canada's Top 20 Under 20 for his work with Louder Than Noise and more than 500 hours of community service.

Miller says that the organization's goals were also the result of his parents, who instilled Jewish values of tzedakah and tikkun olam within him.

"I want to do as much good for the Jewish community as I possibly can," he says. "I was raised to have those values in my life, to use them whenever I can and to always be kind… to always help out."

Miller says that Louder Than Noise has become a second family to him. Still serving as the group's executive director, he is now establishing a chapter at the University of Toronto's Scarborough campus, for next year.

In March, he will host the next Louder Than Noise event. Then, Miller hopes to begin a speaker series in which an inspiring community figure, like a head of a non-profit organization, can engage and motivate youths to be leaders. He says he imagines that these talks could be like Inside the Actors Studio interviews, except with community leaders instead of movie stars.

So, now that Miller has stood up for himself, defying the bullies, what advice does he have for students going through a similar struggle or strain?

"Just know that there are people out there going through the exact same thing as you," he says. "Although I do not know you, I love you very much and I don't like to see you struggle in this hard place that you're in. I know that you can push on and you have the power to do so.

"There's always someone out there who wants to listen. Never think that you're alone in this."

The volume of a statement like that just cannot go quietly.

Visiting the stone

Married With Kids
Lauren Kramer

In the beginning, we'd go often. On her birthday, on Mother's Day, before Yom Kippur and, sometimes, just because. We'd huddle around her tombstone, three figures in a vast, lonely cemetery, remembering, with sorrow, the emptiness left behind after my mother's passing.

But it wasn't long before I started coming up with excuses, reasons that I couldn't join the rest of the family graveside. The grave would bring me right back to her burial. And her burial, in turn, flooded my mind with horrible thoughts of what she'd endured in hospital in the three months before she took her final breath. The bustle of those sterile corridors, nurses bent over their paperwork. The sadness in my mother's eyes as she became increasingly aware that medicine had nothing more to offer her. The pain she went through as she withered from a strong, beautiful woman to a corpse in a shroud. As the months ticked past after her death, I had to banish those memories, lock them away in the name of self-preservation. If I hadn't, they'd haunt and torment me night after night.

It's not how she'd want to be remembered, that much I knew. So I focused on the good memories, the ones that brought a smile to my face. I'd feel her hovering presence when I lit the Shabbat candles each Friday, when I'd say a special prayer for her. And when I was asked to join the family at her grave, I'd politely decline. It was a place I just didn't want to go.

It's been years, now, since I was last there. I hope fervently that the dead have no cognizance of their graveside visitors, for if they do, there's likely a lot of underground disappointment in the cemetery. Guilt? I have plenty of it. Mine appears in the form of a recurring dream wherein my mother has been steadily declining in an institutional home for years, and I have completely forgotten to visit. When I finally remember that she's there, I find a shell of a woman, barely alive. I sit at her bedside, wracked with sorrow at my lack of caring and concern for this woman at the centre of my life, and at all the years I have wasted by not visiting. My fear, in this dream, is that she will never know how deeply and fully I loved her. I wake up feeling awful, with a morning after chased by a black cloud of guilt and shame.

Yet at the very idea of standing by her tombstone, my mind reaches for excuses. Which part of her is really down there, I wonder. I don't feel her spirit as I stand beside that flat stone, placing a pebble or a small bouquet from my garden at the inscription of her name. I've performed these actions and found they don't help me feel close to her. If there's no connection there, is there any point in going?

I'm not alone in feeling this way. I know this because the cemetery is almost always deserted, but for the maintenance staff, cutting the grass, clearing away the residues of pebbles and withered bouquets and preparing sites for the newly deceased. The cemetery is a place of tears and sorrow, not one where lives are celebrated. When I want to feel close to my mother, I hear her laughter in my head and remember the wonderful warmth of her frequent embraces. This brings her into my soul in a way that no forlorn moments in the cold, whistling wind of the cemetery can ever do.

PLAY PEOPLE: As part of an awareness initiative, the student-led tikkun olam committee at Leo Baeck Day School's south campus recently held a "Right to Play Day" to teach students about the work the Right to Play organization does worldwide in encouraging children's participation in play and sports. The committee also organized a sports equipment drive, which donated items to Jewish Family & Child's Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre. The Monday morning cooking club

Carolyn Blackman
Special to The CJN

On a Monday morning about eight years ago, a group of Jewish women from Sydney, Australia, got together to talk about food and share recipes.

The meeting, with debates and discussions about various recipes, was such a success, it grew into the weekly Monday Morning Cooking Club.

Six women, Merelyn Frank Chalmers, Natanya Eskin, Lauren Fink, Lisa Goldberg, Paula Horwitz and Jacqui Israel, eventually compiled their favourite recipes, and turned them into a book called none other than the Monday Morning Cooking Club.

In putting together the book, the women "emailed everyone they knew, and then everyone they knew, and asked them, 'Who is the best cook you know?' We asked again and again, and slowly a list began to take shape. We wrote those cooks and asked for their best recipes. Eventually hundreds trickled in, and we chose the best. Each recipe needed a story or history, or else be unique."

The women met each week and prepared about four or five different recipes, until eventually a list of recipes to be included in the book took shape.

"We asked them for recipes they were known for, those with which they fed their families for years. We also wanted stories behind those recipes, which we could share with our readers," Goldberg said in an email interview from Sydney.

She said the recipes were "tested and retested and tested again until we felt they were failproof. Our families were very well fed, particularly on Mondays."

Their goal in writing the book, she said, was to raise money for charities, including WIZO and OzHarvest, an organization that donates excess food to charities.

The women also wanted to create a "first-class cookbook that could sit in any bookstore alongside cookbooks from the best chefs in the world."

Their work wasn't just for other people, though. "When we were standing around the kitchen island, rolling mamoul, a Middle Eastern pastry [like shortbread] stuffed with dates, pecans and pine nuts, it was a therapeutic experience shared by our sisterhood. And for us, after a stressful day, there is nothing better than baking our favourite cake or batch of biscuits and taking some time out from the world.

"The Jewish community is obsessed with food. Without wanting to detract from the religious significance of many Jewish holidays and important dates, the Jewish community thrives on preparing feasts and feeding people with their love."

In describing Australian Jewish food, Goldberg said the Australian Jewish community can best be seen as a melting pot. "We have a high proportion of postwar migration from Europe, Asia and the Middle East, comprising Ashkenazi and Sephardi Jews, as well as a substantial South African influx in more recent years.

"People arrive on our shores longing for the food they have left behind, and these memories and dishes have been incorporated throughout our community. As a result, Jewish food in Australia is diverse, avaried and delicious."

Merelyn Frank Chalmers, said that Hungarian paprikash was included in the book to honour her Hungarian mother, Yolanda, who survived the Holocaust. "We ate paprikash probably five nights a week. This was something that she just threw together when I wasn't feeling well."

They considered it nothing special, she said, but when Chalmers moved to Sydney and met other children of Hungarian parents, she learned that they all grew up on the same dish. "This dish really reminds me of my mum."

MUM'S RICE PAPRIKASH

1/3 cup olive oil
2 lb. veal stew
3 large onions, chopped finely
1/4 cup white wine
2 cups boiling water
2 cloves garlic, crushed
1 red pepper, sliced
1 heaping tbsp. mild paprika
1/4 tsp. cayenne pepper, or to taste
1 cup long-grain rice
2 carrots, peeled and cut into chunks
1 small tomato, chopped

Heat the olive oil in a frying pan on a medium-high heat and fry the veal until very brown. Remove from the pan and set aside. Add the onions to the pan and fry until very brown, adding more oil if necessary.

Return the veal to the pan and add the wine and boiling water. Add the garlic, red pepper, paprika and cayenne pepper.

Bring to a boil, then reduce the heat and simmer for 30 minutes.

Add the rice, carrots and tomato, stir to combine, then continue to simmer for a further 30 minutes, or until the veal is tender and the rice is cooked. Stir regularly and add more boiling water as required. Season to taste with salt and freshly ground black pepper.

SARA'S PICKLED BRISKET

Sara first made this for her husband's 50th birthday. She had wanted to make American pastrami and was not able to find a recipe. She experimented, and has been using this version for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur for 30 years.

1 pickled beef brisket
1 cup white vinegar
1 cup sugar
9 bay leaves
1 small handful black peppercorns
4 cloves garlic crushed
4 large onions, sliced
1 cup honey
1 tbsp. vegetable oil

If possible, start this recipe the day before. Put the brisket in a large saucepan and cover with water. Add the vinegar and sugar, then bring to the boil, skimming any scum off the surface. Taste to check you have an equal and strong flavour of both vinegar and sugar, and adjust if necessary. Add the bay leaves and peppercorns. Cover the pan with a lid, and simmer rapidly for about two hours until fork tender.

Drain, and place the brisket in a non-stick roasting pan. Rub the garlic over the meat while it is still warm, and allow to cool a little before refrigerating overnight, if possible.

When ready to cook, preheat the oven to 375. Cover the meat with sliced onion and pour over the honey. Drizzle with the oil. Roast, uncovered, for about 45 minutes, basting frequently until the meat is tender and the onions are golden.

Slice thickly across the grain and serve warm with mashed potatoes and cabbage, or in a sandwich on fresh rye bread with mustard, pickled cucumber and coleslaw.

Down and out in downtown Toronto

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Simon Kalkstein, supervisor of the Gordon S. Wolfe branch of Jewish Family & Child, laughed when asked if his job is 9 to 5.

On the day of his interview with The CJN at the downtown branch, located on Madison Avenue in Toronto's Annex neighbourhood, he was scheduled to help a client with a hoarding problem hire a cleaner for his apartment before an inspection by community housing.

"He's a bright guy who doesn't take care of himself," Kalkstein said.

He also had a visit planned with a woman who is bipolar and likes to come in and talk, as well as a consultation with a family whose disabled son is looking for a job. "I hope to get him into a sheltered workshop.

"That's what I know about so far. I never know what will come up," said Kalkstein, 65, a social worker who has been with the agency for almost 38 years.

He started with JF&CS on Beverley Street downtown, moved to the Lipa Green Building on Bathurst Street north of Sheppard Avenue, and in 1988 became supervisor at the downtown branch, then located at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

Opinion

Looking back, looking ahead

Irwin Cotler

I recall fondly my first visit to Parliament. The year was 1951, and my father took me, an 11-year-old, to the House of Commons and spoke words that still resonate to this day: "Son, this is the Parliament of Canada. This is vox populi – 'the voice of the people'."

Today, such sentiments might be greeted with a certain degree of cynicism – particularly as one observes the cacophony of question period or the toxicity in the political arena. Fortunately, I retain both great respect and reverence for this institution, which I have come to view as the centrepiece of our democracy and the cradle for the pursuit of justice.

When I announced that I would not seek re-election – having served some 15 years – I had the opportunity to reflect on my time here. When I was elected, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, my predecessor in Mount Royal, imparted important words of wisdom: "You can compromise on matters of policy, but never compromise on matters of principle." I have sought to pursue that course, and to act on matters of principle as they underpin issues of policy.

Though it is perhaps not well known, I never intended to run for Parliament, as I was perfectly happy as a McGill University law professor and human rights lawyer. When the vacancy arose in the riding as a result of MP Sheila Finestone's appointment to the Senate, there was a field of candidates already vying for the seat. I had no interest in running and turned away any request to do so. Nonetheless, a draft movement developed, the other candidates dropped out, the nomination deadline was imminent, and, as Finestone had one year left in her mandate, I looked upon going to Ottawa as a sabbatical. I can acknowledge that I had no intention of serving five years, let alone the 15 I will have served by the end of this year.

As I continued to serve in Parliament, which I consider to be one of the highest forms of public service, I was invited by prime minister Paul Martin to join his cabinet as minister of justice and attorney general of Canada.

Water Bill Ruling

MONTREAL — The Boisbriand Jewish community must pay an accumulated $2.6 million in water taxes, the Quebec Court of Appeal has ruled after hearing the group's contestation of the overdue municipal bill. The community consists of 3,000 Tasher Chassidim, who haven't paid water taxes since 2005. The Jan. 31 decision by the province's highest court upholds a December 2012 Quebec Court judgment that the town has the right to collect the debt from the community, a ruling consistent with three lower court decisions in 2010 and 2011. The community was also ordered to pay the town's legal costs. The Tashers' lawyer said they may seek leave to appeal to the Supreme Court.

WORLD

Hate Incidents Down

LONDON — Anti-Semitic incidents in Britain fell 18 per cent over the previous year, an annual survey says. The Community Security Trust (CST), which advises Britain's Jewish community on security, recorded 529 anti-Semitic incidents in 2013, compared to 649 incidents in 2012. Incidents included 69 violent assaults, the same number as 2012. Eighty-six incidents involved the use of social media for anti-Semitic threats or abuse, versus 81 such incidents the previous year. The most common in 2013 involved verbal abuse randomly directed at visibly Jewish people in public, with 185 incidents. The CST has recorded U.K. anti-Semitic incidents since 1984. The most was 931 in 2009.

Space Centre Planned

TEL AVIV — A new educational centre for space, technology and science named for the late Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon will be built in central Israel. The Ramon Campus is a joint project of the Ramon Foundation and Bar-Ilan University. A meeting to launch it was held Feb. 6 at the university. Ramon was a payload specialist aboard the U.S. Space Shuttle Columbia, which disintegrated as it re-entered earth's atmosphere in February 2003.

Hospital Gets Gift

TEHRAN — Iranian President Hassan Rouhani reportedly donated $400,000 to the Jewish hospital in Tehran. The New York Times bureau chief in Tehran, Thomas Erdbrink, tweeted the news Feb. 6, citing the semi-official Mehr news service. At the same time, the official IRNA news agency said Rouhani donated $170,000 to the hospital, reportedly part of an effort on his part to pay attention to Iran's minorities. The Dr. Sapir Hospital and Charity Center was founded in 1942 and is Iran's only Jewish hospital. Iran is home to some 25,000 Jews. Rouhani has seemingly been distancing himself from his predecessor, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who regularly denied the Holocaust and threatened Israel.

Ex-Montrealer Arrested In Actor's Death

NEW YORK — Montreal-born Robert Vineberg, 57, a struggling jazz and pop saxophonist, was one of four people arrested in connection with the Feb. 2 heroin overdose death of Acadamy Award-winning actor Philip Seymour Hoffman.

Robert Vineberg

Police reportedly found 250 heroin bags in Vineberg's possession at his Greenwich Village home, the New York Daily News reported.

Vineberg, also known as Robert Aaron, has lived in New York since he was a teenager and is a former musician and record producer who has worked with such figures as David Bowie, Paul Simon, Wyclef Jean, Tom Jones and the late Amy Winehouse.

He was indicted Feb. 5 in a Manhattan court on charges of possessing heroin with intent to sell. His cellphone number was also reportedly found on Hoffman's phone.

Muslim condo project draws opposition

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Hundreds of people packed Vaughan's city council chambers – as well as two overflow rooms – Feb. 4 for a town hall meeting on plans to build a highrise condo complex catering to Muslims in the predominately Jewish suburb of Thornhill Woods.

The Islamic Shia Ithna Asheri Jamaat (ISIJ) wants to build subsidized housing in the form of two 17-storey towers, 61 townhouses as well as assisted living facilities for seniors on its 30-acre property adjacent to the Jaffari Centre mosque at 9000 Bathurst St., south of Rutherford Road. The Jaffari Centre is near the Ner Israel Yeshiva of Toronto, an Orthodox Jewish school for boys.

Rom Koubi, chair of the Association to Preserve Thornhill Woods, the organization behind a petition that has so far garnered more than 4,000 signatures from people who oppose the ISIJ's proposal to rezone the low-density suburb, was one of the many who spoke at the three-hour gathering.

He said the exceptions to zoning bylaws that the developers are seeking to accommodate the highrise buildings, "do not make sense for Thornhill Woods."

Those who opposed the plan were careful to focus their arguments around zoning bylaws and the impact that 500 new living units and more than 1,400 residents would have on the suburb's infrastructure, traffic and parking, as well as local schools that are already at capacity.

Many also voiced concerns about the ISIJ's initial plan to make the development open only to Muslims.

On Feb. 3, Shabbir Jeraj, president of the Jaffari Centre told City News that the condo development would only be open to Muslim families, "because we are building it, we are paying for it. How is that inconsistent with other communities that have come before us and established similar developments?"

Some of the hundreds of people who came out to a community meeting on a proposed high-rise condo complex catering to the Muslim community.

Speaking to council, Koubi cited the ISIJ proposal's intention to keep the development Muslim only, and its claim that such the complex would be similar to other centres, such as the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan .

Kerry bumbles into trouble with BDS remarks

Tempers flared last week between Israel and the United States over U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry's warnings that, if the peace process failed, Israel would face growing boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaigns. Tempers also flared within Israeli government circles over reactions to Kerry. Overall, it was not a pretty scene, and responses revealed reason for concern on several levels.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

On Feb. 1, at the Munich Security Conference, Kerry reflected on the state of the peace talks and what might happen if they failed: "Today's status quo absolutely, to a certainty, I promise you 100 per cent, cannot be maintained. It's not sustainable. It's illusionary." He then turned his attention specifically to Israel: "You see for Israel, there's an increasing delegitimization campaign that has been building up. People are very sensitive to it. There are talks of boycotts and other kinds of things."

Senior Israeli cabinet ministers charged that Kerry had threatened Israel and even endorsed BDS. Although this was not the first time Kerry had referred to the looming threats of BDS, even Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, at least initially, voiced his own criticism of Kerry's remarks. Israeli Strategic Affairs Minister Yuval Steinitz called his statements "offensive, unfair and intolerable."

The New York Times' Isabel Kershner wrote (Feb. 2) that the "the heated exchange comes as the Obama administration prepares to complete and present a 'framework' accord in the coming weeks, which would be a first step toward a comprehensive agreement and serve as a basis for a continuation of negotiations."

Kershner noted that the U.S. State Department immediately replied to the criticisms, saying that Kerry had always opposed calls for anti-Israel boycotts. It urged all parties "to accurately portray his record and statements."

Some Israeli cabinet ministers, such as Justice Minister Tzipi Livini (also Israel's chief negotiator with the Palestinians) and Finance Minister Yair Lapid, came to Kerry's defence, saying he was only warning against what might transpire, not that he was favouring anti-Israel measures. Lapid recently warned that Israel is indeed vulnerable to a boycott by its largest trading partner, the European Union, and that even a partial boycott could cost Israel billions of dollars and thousands of jobs.

The Times of Israel noted that "Livni has defended Kerry's statements and harshly criticized right-wing lawmakers who had lambasted the top American diplomat, accusing them of undermining diplomatic relations with Israel's closest ally." It quoted her: "'Some of those who speak harshly against the U.S. secretary of state would lower their eyes in embarrassment if they knew what Kerry has done to prevent these threats and these boycotts.'"

Still others pointed out that, while Kerry certainly wasn't endorsing boycotts, his raising the spectre of increased BDS was inept, demonstrating his failure to understand the Israeli public's concerns about being isolated and under assault – attitudes that will only diminish their willingness to take risks for peace.

For instance, Patrick Martin ("Israel views trade boycott as strategic threat," Globe and Mail, Feb. 5) cited former Israeli ambassador to Washington Michael Oren's comment that "This approach can be counterproductive… Israel doesn't make concessions when it's threatened. The way to get Israel to make concessions is to make it feel secure."

In his Feb. 5 column, Times of Israel editor David Horovitz, a respected moderate, reiterated Oren's consternation: "U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry may feel heartfelt concern about the growing campaign to delegitimize Israel and to boycott it. One of the least smart and least constructive ways to tackle the danger, however, is by issuing an anguished public prediction that this is what awaits Israel if his peace effort fails."

Horovitz added: "Let me stress that I have no time for those on the rejectionist right who waded in to publicly assail the secretary. The Naftali Bennetts, Ofir Akunises and Danny Danons of this world dismally seize every opportunity to advance their one-state non-solution."

The rancour over BDS is merely one aspect of a complex of negotiations for which there apparently are no immediate solutions, let alone agreement on the issues.

Contributing their fair share

It seems inevitable now that Israel's ultra-Orthodox community will be forced to contribute many more of its young people to army service in the not-too-distant future. This eventuality became all the more clear last week when Finance Minister Yair Lapid halted government payments to ultra-Orthodox yeshivas following an injunction issued by the High Court of Justice against the continued funding of yeshiva students who dodge the draft.

Lapid's decision reflected determined efforts to force the ultra-Orthodox to contribute their fair share of soldiers stretching back at least a decade (and, in a less organized and popular way, to the birth of the state). The Tal Law passed by the Knesset in July 2002 – the very law ultra-Orthodox students have relied upon to avoid army service ever since – was in itself a significant step toward enforced, mandatory conscription for the majority of haredim. When the Tal Law expired a year and a half ago and Yesh Atid (Lapid's political party, which campaigned on bringing the ultra-Orthodox to account) placed second in the January 2013 election, it became clear there was no turning back.

Even so, there was nothing wrong with the ultra-Orthodox protests last week, which followed the arrest of a yeshiva student for the crime of draft dodging. Yes, a few demonstrators proved more violent than the rest, but it's important to remember why the haredi community is so bothered by the matter of providing soldiers to defend the state: because it truly believes doing so would be an act of rebellion against God. In the end, just because the law compels Israel down this path doesn't mean Israelis shouldn't show some sensitivity toward the many ultra-Orthodox Jews facing a radically different future.

In the wake of the haredi protests, a schism developed within Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's governing coalition. Lapid and the Yesh Atid ranks demanded that ultra-Orthodox draft-dodgers face criminal prosecution, while the religious Zionist Habayit Hayehudi faction, led by Economy Minister Naftali Bennett, argued financial sanctions alone are sufficient. Fining yeshiva students who refuse the army isn't a long-term solution – that path leads to allowing any Israeli to pay their way out of the draft, an arrangement many wealthy families would likely find attractive as an alternative to service.

Omitting criminal sanctions might be reasonable for now to ease the ultra-Orthodox transition into a new reality, but, ultimately, haredi yeshiva students, with few exceptions, should face the same protocol as other Israelis, and that means you get to choose between going to the army or going to jail.

There remains the question of whether the IDF in fact needs these thousands of extra ultra-Orthodox recruits. On this matter, authorities are of two minds – some say the army has more than enough soldiers without adding the ultra-Orthodox (who are less likely to be educated in the sorts of subject areas that would come in handy in training and combat), while others claim the IDF can always find useful places to plug in new bodies.

But even if the army doesn't need the ultra-Orthodox, there must be some way the haredim can give back to the state, beyond the walls of the yeshiva.

What's fair is fair.

A BDS 'compromise'

A recent story ("Where's the line in campus debates about Israel?" The CJN, Feb. 6) reported about a controversy within Hillel about its decision to disallow Jewish organizations that support the boycott of Israel, or at least Israeli "settlement" products and services, from using Hillel as a platform.

May I suggest a compromise? Hillel should allow these organizations to express their views as long as they simultaneously oppose the Palestinian fiction of "right" of return and demand that the Palestinians remove Jew- and Israeli-hatred from their educational curricula.

Ukraine's fight concerns us all

I am a longtime subscriber with a serious interest in politics, both Canadian and international. I have been consumed with the events in Ukraine since November, not only because my paternal ancestors lived there, but also because of its active fight for democracy. I have been disappointed to see that Canadian Jewish News has ignored this story.

I believe Ukraine has significance for Jews, not only for those who live there, but for those of us who hate totalitarian or anti-democratic regimes. If the Jewish community in Canada does not see the need to show an interest in Ukraine, may I suggest that they read "An Open Address to the Jews of the World," by the Jewish historian Vitaliy Nakhmanovich, which was recently published by the Euro-Asian Jewish Congress: http://eajc.org/page34/news43050.html.

The meaning of 'never again'

Avrum Rosensweig asks whether "never again" has an expiration date ("An expiry date for 'never again'? The CJN, Feb. 6).

The answer is, yes it does.

"Never again" will expire when decent, good-intentioned people distort its purpose and meaning for political aims. Rosensweig urges us "to re-embrace our commitment to 'never again,'" particularly toward refugee claimants to Canada, who are "regularly turned away from our hospitals, and more, seriously, our shores."

Rosensweig should know that "never again" was our vow to never again permit the enemies of the Jewish People to succeed in the vilest expression of their hatred. "Never again" had nothing whatsoever to do with the issues Rosensweig cites, as justifiable as they may be, regarding our present Canadian government policies.

A prayer for the Queen

I was fascinated to read Rabbi Philip Scheim's column ("We have truly come a long way," The CJN, Feb 6) about saying prayers on Shabbat for Prime Minister Stephen Harper. The problem is that Harper is not the head of state, the Queen is, as you will see if you look at Canadian coins and stamps. For this reason, the Kiever shul in Toronto uses the form of prayer, standard throughout the British Commonwealth, which refers to the Queen, not Harper. This usage was formerly common throughout Canada, but dropped out of use in recent years. There is a halachic opinion that since the Queen is only a constitutional monarch, she has no power and, therefore, is not worth praying for, but the fact remains that all acts of Parliament have to be signed by her or her proxy, the governor general. The advantage of praying for the Queen is that you can still pray for the welfare of Canada, regardless of who you vote for.

Trip to Sighet

The municipality of Sighet–Maramorish, Romania, and the Sighet Jewish community is planning memorial ceremonies from May 16 to 20 to commemorate the deportations of the Jews from Sighet during World War II. There will be opportunities to visit the local Jewish cemetery, archives and walk in the footsteps of your ancestors. An exhibit will be launched and we are looking for pictures prewar and postwar, as well books, memoirs or research papers. Harper has made Israel a wedge issue

Historic trip a case study of Canada's diplomatic two-step

Adam Goldenberg

Last month, as Prime Minister Stephen Harper visited Ramallah, an Israeli journalist asked him to clarify Canada's position on the legality of Israeli settlements in the West Bank. He refused to answer.

"Any attempt to have me, while present in the Middle East, single out the State of Israel for criticism, I will not do," Harper said.

Later that day, he stood before the Knesset in Jerusalem and described such "criticism that selectively condemns only the Jewish state" as "the new anti-Semitism."

Yet, the government of Canada's official position, according to the Department of Foreign Affairs, is that "Israeli settlements in the occupied territories [including the West Bank] are a violation of the Fourth Geneva Convention," and that "the settlements also constitute a serious obstacle to achieving a comprehensive, just and lasting peace."

In other words – and by the prime minister's own standards – the Conservative government is willing to "single out the State of Israel for criticism."

Does that make Stephen Harper an anti-Semite?

That suggestion is absurd, of course, but it follows from the prime minister's logic, not mine. Nor is his name-calling the point. The gulf between the government's words and its actions – between its style and its substance – rebuts the Conservative claim that the prime minister's approach to the Middle East is purely "principled."

Canada's opposition to Israel's West Bank settlements is "principled," after all – it's based on our country's longstanding, principled commitment to international law.

It should surprise no one that Harper's maiden voyage to Israel was a case study in the diplomatic two-step that the region has always required. Every Canadian government, including the present one, has had at least some reservations about at least some of Israel's policies. The difference, as Harper's studied silence on settlements illustrates, has been one of emphasis – of style more than substance.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper addresses the Knesset during his recent visit to Israel. [Amos Ben Gershom /GPO]

Not that style is insignificant. The prime minister's stubborn refusal to criticize the Israeli government publicly has won him friends both in Jerusalem and among Canadian Jews. For better or worse, Harper has earned a reputation as Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's most reliable – and predictable –cheerleader.

No doubt Harper's support for Israel is genuine, a cocktail of ideological neo-conservatism, Christian evangelicalism, and an earnest desire for the approval of Jewish Conservative partisans. Yet, there's also no doubt that his fellow Tories have exploited his heartfelt support for Israel in a manner that reflects political choices, not principled ones.

Mark Adler, the Conservative MP for York Centre, emphasized this point rather succinctly during Harper's trip to Israel. At the Western Wall, Adler tried to elbow his way into a photo with his boss. "It's the re-election!" he begged the prime minister's staff, as the cameras rolled.

The prime minister's guest list tells a similar story of political stagecraft. Jason Kenney, the minister responsible for the Conservatives' charm offensive to Jews and other minority groups, joined Harper on his Israel trip. So did Stockwell Day, a former minister who was among the Jewish community's most enthusiastic suitors while in cabinet.

The prime minister hardly required so much Tory star-power simply to impress his Israeli hosts. No, his target audience was more local: Canadian Jews.

The Conservatives are betting that the 21 rabbis and assorted Tory-friendly Jewish leaders from across the country who followed Harper to the Holy Land would return to Canada to preach the Gospel of Stephen – and Jason and Stockwell, to boot. That strategy is already working, as clergy sermonize about the prime minister and his Conservative apostles from the pulpit.

This political strategy, as much as anything else, explains why Harper bit his tongue in Ramallah, rather than admit that his government opposes Israeli settlements in the West Bank. Netanyahu knows where Canada stands on the issue. Harper even expressed his objections directly to his Israeli counterpart during a closed-door meeting last month. But the Conservatives' most ardent Jewish supporters back home are often blind, willfully or otherwise, to the actual nuances of Canada's Middle East policy. Reminding Canadian Jews – including the ones he brought with him to Israel – that his government sometimes does, in fact, "single out the State of Israel for criticism" was not on the prime minister's political itinerary.

If Harper's support for Israel were truly "principled," he would seek to share it as widely as possible, particularly across party lines. Instead, the Tories, in many cases aided and abetted by the leaders of Jewish organizations, have systematically sought to marginalize Canadians, both Jewish and not, who support Israel but not Harper.

A case in point: In 2008, Georganne Burke, then an aide to Conservative Minister of State Gary Goodyear, made news when she tried to bully Toronto's Zareinu Educational Centre, a school for disabled children, into cancelling a Chanukah celebration. Why? Because then Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff had been invited to help light the candles.

Burke's partisan thuggery was part and parcel of the ongoing Conservative campaign to monopolize the political life of Canada's Jewish community. Yet, as Harper's plane left Ottawa for Tel Aviv, there was Burke, snugly aboard. For her partisan harassment of Jewish schoolchildren, she was rewarded with, as she tweeted from Jerusalem during the trip, "a great adventure."

This is the dark underbelly of the prime minister's otherwise laudable support for the Jewish state: his party has snatched vice from the jaws of virtue and turned Israel into a partisan bauble, a mere wedge to divide the electorate.

In Israel, Stephen Harper did his level best not to undermine his party's efforts. Not only did he downplay Canada's principled opposition to Israel's West Bank settlements, but he also suggested that it would be "the new anti-Semitism" even to state his own government's position. The prime minister's Canadian audience, dazzled by his duplicity, beheld his politics and called it principle.

At a certain point, the spin starts to refute itself.

BDS and Oxfam defeated at the Super Bowl

Gerald Steinberg
in Jerusalem

The ongoing political war against Israel, being waged through a highly aggressive campaign of boycotts, divestment and sanctions (BDS), was handed its most significant defeat at the Super Bowl in New Jersey, and on hundreds of millions of screens around the world. The television commercials, including one for the Israeli firm SodaStream, featuring actress Scarlett Johansson, were more interesting than the game.

In the weeks before the big event, Johansson came under intense pressure from the BDS-bully squad, which demanded that she pull out and disassociate herself from the Israeli connection. The actress was also a "global ambassador" for the international humanitarian aid group Oxfam, whose leaders repeated these BDS-based demands, in sync with radical anti-Israel groups such as Electronic Intifada. To her immense credit, Johansson rejected the bullying and the accompanying personal attacks, and instead, told Oxfam to find another "ambassador."

By standing firm, Johansson and the owners of SodaStream demonstrated that even the most full-blown BDS attacks can be defeated. In its counterattack, SodaStream exposed the myths that underlie the boycotts and the broader delegitimization campaigns targeting Israel, including the fact that the 500 Palestinian Arab employees at the Ma'aleh Adumim plant (a "settlement" located on the outskirts of Jerusalem) enjoyed the same pay and health benefits as their Israeli counterparts.

In contrast to previous battles, in this case, it was the proponents and enablers of BDS that were put on the defensive, and they didn't do well in this role. Oxfam denied that it was involved in BDS, but the facts proved the contrary. Between 2011 and 2013, the Dutch branch, known as Oxfam Novib, provided almost $500,000 (largely from government funds provided ostensibly for humanitarian aid) to one of the most radical BDS leaders, the Coalition of Women for Peace (CWP). This group also received funds from Oxfam GB (Great Britain). The discrepancy between Oxfam's claims and the documentation of it's role in BDS was highlighted by SodaStream executives and in a number of media articles.

Although CWP is technically an Israel-based NGO, almost all of its activities are focused externally in promoting boycott campaigns, particularly in Europe. (For political purposes, ever since the NGO Forum of the infamous 2001 UN Durban anti-racism conference, the Arab and European leaders of BDS often use fringe Israeli and Jewish groups as facades, and this is the case with CWP.) In addition to Oxfam, other funders for CWP's radical and immoral agenda include government-funded German NGOs, as well the United Church of Canada and anti-Israel church groups in Ireland and Holland.

Another myth exposed in the SodaStream-Johansson showdown is the claim that BDS is "limited" to opposing the post-1967 war occupation and settlements. This myth was quoted by many journalists, who did not go beyond press statements. However, at the 2001 Durban NGO Forum, thousands of boycott advocates clearly stated that their goal is the elimination of Jewish sovereign equality, regardless of borders – in their words, "the complete international isolation of Israel as an apartheid state." This objective hasn't changed.

Omar Barghouti, among the radical leaders and ideologues of the BDS bully squad, has said that the "only ethical solution is a (single) democratic, secular and civic state in historic Palestine" which means "by definition, Jews will be a minority." In refuting the myth of limited goals, the fundamentally immoral objectives of BDS have been thrust into the open.

In order to move beyond this battle, a wider confrontation is necessary with the BDS industry, which is supported by tens of millions of dollars annually. These massive budgets, manipulated via hidden European government sources, are funnelled to radical NGOs, as well as anti-Israel church groups that often include classical anti-Semitic replacement theology (meaning that Christians have "replaced" the Jews). Beyond Oxfam, other "moral" superpowers taking an active part in the immoral war against Israel include Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch, whose leaders repeatedly demonstrate their personal and highly destructive anti-Israel obsessions.

The most important lesson is that notwithstanding their financial backing and political support, BDS anti-Israel bullying and intimidation can be defeated, as demonstrated by SodaStream and Scarlett Johansson.

Reform Judaism is making inroads in Israel

Yair Lootsteen
in Jerusalem

Life is easier in North America than here in Israel. Making a decent living is less onerous, there are no ongoing security concerns, people are generally more polite, the driving is less stressful, the streets cleaner, the shops and malls a bit more posh.

But I wouldn't live anywhere but Israel. My family and I have good lives. We travel a lot. My kids are growing up as independent, responsible young adults. They're getting a good public education. The weather is pretty darn good. Tiny Israel has diverse natural treasures. And most Israelis really are sabras – tough, sometimes prickly, but soft, sweet and sensitive on the inside, once you cut through their thick epidermis.

Don't get me wrong: you live in a great place, too. In the years since I made aliyah from Toronto in 1979, I've been asked many times why I left a place like Canada. Surprisingly, my answer hasn't really changed. The bottom line – and I'm not proselytizing – is that I simply feel more at home here. It's the place I believe I belong and the place I feel belongs to me. I care more about what happens here than in other places in the world.

And it's because I care about this country and the direction it's going that I'm troubled by several things happening here. One of them concerns a lack of Jewish religious pluralism.

I recently spent three weeks in North America involved in matters relating to Reform Judaism, both abroad and here in Israel. Having become increasingly involved in the Israeli Reform movement over the last few years, I was asked to speak at different venues in Southern Ontario and Calgary on behalf of ARZA Canada during its Israel Week. I also participated in the Union of Reform Judaism's (URJ) Biennial in San Diego.

Visiting North America, I was impressed by the strength of Reform Judaism and its well-regarded position as the largest religious Jewish stream on the continent. An Orthodox Israeli acquaintance who was at the biennial in a semi-official capacity told me how astounded he was to feel the energy of 5,000 committed Jews convening and praying together. He had never seen anything like it.

I learned a lot in San Diego about challenges facing the URJ and its 900-plus synagogues – the Pew Report findings being only one of them – but also about great success stories.

In many ways, being a Reform Jew in Israel is more challenging than in North America. Israel is the only western democracy where not all Jews are treated equally. Ultra-Orthodox and Orthodox communities get huge government subsidies. Liberal Jewish streams receive almost no funding, and most of the financial support they do get has been the result of prolonged legal battles. There's an Orthodox monopoly on state-run religious services. Marriages, conversions and the like performed by Reform or Conservative rabbis are not recognized.

And some things happening here would sound loud alarms bells if they occurred outside Israel. On Jan. 29, the walls of Kehillat Ra'anan, Ra'anana's only Reform synagogue, were desecrated. Graffiti was sprayed across the building's façade. Particularly shocking were repeated references to Maimonides' Laws of Repentance, Chapter III, 14, stating among other things, that "None of them have a place in the world to come, even if they are Jews," and to Psalm 139: 21-22, "Do I not hate those who hate you, Lord, and abhor those who are in rebellion against you? I have nothing but hatred for them; I count them as my enemies."

This type of anti-Semitic hate-crime wouldn't be tolerated in other places. Here it went almost unreported in the national press and wasn't condemned by anyone in government. And this isn't the first time this synagogue was targeted. Its walls were sprayed in the past and several of its windows were broken. The police didn't solve those crimes, and I have little expectation they'll do so this time, either.

Despite the Ra'anana incident, not all is bleak. The Reform movement is growing in Israel. There are now more than 40 congregations around the country. The movement's Israel Religious Action Center continues making important legal inroads. There's optimism in the air, and Israelis are increasingly realizing there's more than one way to be Jewish in Israel, too.

This is a worthy struggle. Persevering, we will make Israel an even better place for my children, and yours.

No requirement for them to be labelled in Canada.

Panel asks if GMOs are safe and ethical

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

As humans, we can alter genetic codes, but does that mean we should do it? That question was at the heart of the topic addressed by the panel on genetically modified organisms (GMOs) at a recent conference in Toronto.

The panel on "Canola, Corn, Soy… OY! A Multi-Faith and Multi-Sector Response to Genetically Modified Foods" took place at the Shoresh Food Conference Feb. 2 at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre. It brought together a representative from Judaism, Islam and Christianity, who spoke of how each group approaches the question of GMOs.

"Do we have the right to go into genetic code and play around and create whatever we want to create?" Rabbi Jordan Helfman asked, setting up what turned out to be a central component in determining the religious arguments for and against the procedure.

Many of the arguments against GMOs are in opposition to the actions of agricultural biotechnology corporation Monsanto. The company has created RoundUp, a herbicide used to kill weeds. It has also genetically modified crops to be resistant to this herbicide.

While several major science organizations have concluded that GMOs aren't any riskier than other forms of plant-breeding technologies, many people are not convinced. Opponents of GMOs are sometimes concerned about how the herbicides could affect those who eat GMOs, or how the technology affects independent farmers. Others focus specifically on the moral argument presented by Rabbi Helfman.

One of the major objections to the use of GMOs is that they do not need to be labelled in Canada, said panellist Lucy Sharratt from the Canadian Biotechnology Action Network, which describes itself as a group that provides information to governments for policy development.

She argued that there isn't enough scientific evidence to show that GMOs are safe for consumption. She said the public was not consulted when GMOs were brought into Canada.

"Many scientists…would argue this is an immature technology that we're applying in our food," she said, explaining that it is particularly prevalent in corn, canola, soy and sugar beets. "The risk evaluation for this technology excludes farmers and religious communities."

There is no consensus among the religious communities in determining where GMOs fit into religious laws.

Rabbi Helfman outlined numerous issues with GMOs in Jewish law, and described why one of the key components in determining the Jewish viewpoint has to do with kashrut.

"Whenever we talk about genetically modified foods, pigs always come up in Judaism," he said, explaining that the jury is out on whether pigs could become kosher if it were possible to find the genetic code that causes split hooves, for example.

He said one concern is that if a pig gene is used to alter the genetic code of produce or another animal, "does that pig gene make this item treif?" He then explained that Jewish law might allow it if the code comprises only a miniscule portion of a full pig's genetic code.

Ziyaad Mia, a lawyer who spoke on the Muslim philosophy on GMOs, said Muslims struggle with the debate in much the same way as Jews in terms of whether they could be considered halal.

He said the Qur'an prohibits disruption of the fundamental balance of the world. Unlike in Judaism, human beings are not given dominion over the earth in Islam, he explained, adding that his concern is primarily with animal welfare.

"We need to look at them as subjects, not objects," he said. "I'm a little uncomfortable with GMOs because we're looking at everything as an instrument."

Catherine Wright, a PhD candidate in Christian ethics at the University of Toronto, shared the Christian thoughts on GMOs, and was the most decisive of the religious representatives on the issue.

"Genetic engineering messes with life, it messes with truth, it messes with our common inheritance, it messes with justice, it messes with health… and relationships," she said.

All three discussed whether GMOs are harmful or beneficial to the world. Proponents of the technology often argue that it would help eradicate hunger by increasing the yield of food. However, the panellists questioned the validity of this theory.

"Instead of feeding the world, it will exacerbate hunger and malnutrition," Wright said. "It's about power and profit."

Rabbi Helfman said he, as well as many other rabbis, do not feel qualified to determine the impact of GMOs on the world. He questioned the way corporations have patented GMO crops, leading to the question of whether it's right to patent a living organism. However, he said it would be bad to say it is categorically wrong, and each seed must be examined on its own.

But Mia said it's a little clearer in Islam, though Muslim experts have not come to a definitive conclusion.

"Islam would say we shouldn't allow ownership of things that are essential to life," he said, though he added that if GMOs can fight hunger, they might be sanctioned in Islam.

However, he said that what's most important in his mind is examining the reasons why companies produce GMOs.

"Whenever there is money to be made, I get suspicious and dig a little deeper," he said.

Given that companies don't need to label GMOs, Sharratt said those who are concerned with the technology and how it fits into religious ethics can only definitively avoid it by buying organic.

The article "Is Harper-led Canada Israel's New Best Friend?" (Jan. 30) incorrectly stated that York University was the first university to host Israel Apartheid Week. In fact, Israel Apartheid Week had previously been held at the University of Toronto. The CJN regrets the error.

Lebovic centre remains open to everyone

Kuobi noted that "the Lebovic community was partially funded by the government... The [Lebovic] centre is open to every person regardless of colour, religion, or race. Anyone can be a member. It is a fully inclusive cultural centre."

Thornhill Woods resident Limor Twena, a mother of three, added, "I appreciate the multicultural aspect of the neighbourhood... But I have a problem with creating a community within a community that is going to be segregated and won't allow me to participate and serve me... because I'm not of that faith."

Speaking to CTV News in a story posted Feb. 5, Shafiq Punjani, a developer of the project, said the development would be open to everybody.

"In fact, it's something that the Ontario law obviously governs. There is a human rights code in place, and we fully intended to live to the letter of the law," Punjani said.

In a statement issued by the ISIJ following the meeting, Jeraj said, "While we are still in the planning phase, our intention is to design the development with the broader community in mind. As such, we envision that many parts of the development will be open to all residents of Vaughan and the surrounding areas, including the playing fields and tennis courts."

Morris Hadida, a real estate broker with Sutton Group Associates who lives in Thornhill Woods, told The CJN that much of the opposition to the plan "has nothing to do with them being Muslim. It's the highrise subsidized housing.

"Highrise subsidized housing causes two problems: one, it's an eyesore. People move to the suburbs not to be around highrise buildings."

Another issue, Hadida said, is that the development could devalue the homes in the area, most of which are worth more than $850,000.

"I had the experience where I moved from Toronto because my bungalow was backing onto a condo, and it did affect property values... I know the houses directly in the area would suffer in value... if they're backing onto subsidized properties," he said.

"If they wanted to do just townhouses and not highrises, that would be one thing, even subsidized townhouses... Out of sight out of mind is one thing, but when it's in your face, it really will hurt the market... The fact that there is potential for this, it will hurt the market this spring."

While those who spoke out against the proposal heavily outnumbered those in support, members of the Muslim community appealed to the council to approve a plan that they feel would benefit both the Muslim community and the surrounding community of Thornhill Woods by creating jobs and recreational facilities such as tennis courts.

Rom Koubi

One woman who spoke in support of the development said it would help her community maintain its religious identity in a way that "goes beyond the scope of a school, or an educational system. The lifestyle that I refer to has to do with the development of our property at 9000 Bathurst so that not only are our children's education needs are met, but rather our whole life experience is enriched."

But another woman countered that opposition to the plan "has nothing to do with... stopping someone from practising their religion or faith. This has to do with not wanting our community to have highrise buildings, not wanting our community to be so dense and fearing our children walking to school. The issue is that we want our community to stay the way it is, the way the city zoned it to be."

Following the meeting, Vaughan Ward 4 Councillor Sandra Yeung Racco, who represents the area and is the Liberal candidate in Thornhill, posted a message on a Facebook group called "Preserve Thornhill Woods Community – Say NO to High Rise buildings" that the next step is to put together a community task force "and work together with the applicant and staff to address the various issues that were brought forward this evening and to come up with a mutually agreeable plan. This may take months, but I believe this is the best route to take."

Lawrence Cherniak

Longtime NCSY volunteer 'changed the community'

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Lawrence Cherniak, who died on Feb. 2 at age 71 after a long illness, will be remembered for his role in the growth and development in Canada of the National Conference of Synagogue Youth, the Orthodox Union's youth movement.

Obituary

Lawrence Cherniak

Rabbi Glenn Black, CEO of NCSY Canada, said that "Lawrie was an integral part of building NCSY in Toronto and Canada. He served on our board for several decades, in particular guiding our development and fundraising departments, and no matter what challenges he faced, he always kept NCSY's interests and its future at the top of his priorities."

In his eulogy, Rabbi Black said that Cherniak, who was trained as a teacher, was one of Canada's oldest NCSY volunteers. "He [along with] David Woolf, Zale Newman, and the late Nosson Westreich built the organization in its earliest days with a handful of dedicated participants into an integral outreach force in the community, one that today affects the lives of thousands of Jewish teens across Canada each year."

Rabbi Black said that the vision "Lawrie shared with us changed the community. NCSY's legacy of thousands of families impacted by Yiddishkeit is his legacy. It grew from his passion and his persistence for Klal Yisrael's needs. His time, his inspiring talks, his countless interactions with teens – if we could emulate even a fraction of his energy and devotion in those earlier years, we would be achieving great things."

He said that Cherniak "took responsibility for each child, as any parent would. A parent is not someone who simply creates a child, but someone who brings them to a higher form of existence, through Torah and life of mitzvot.

"It was this way that he raised [his children] Symee and [the late] Michael. And it was in his nature to take responsibility for so many other children. He adopted every one of these NCSY kids. They all became his own."

Rabbi Black said that when NCSY was looking for partners to bring the families of unaffiliated participants together with families from various synagogues to build meaningful relationships, "[Lawrie] and his wife, Debbie, sponsored and facilitated family Shabbat dinners, that brought together more than 800 people to five synagogues in Toronto. He and Debbie reached out to their friends and family to encourage them to participate in this huge undertaking."

Zale Newman, who knew Cherniak for 45 years, said that from a young age, "Lawrence was involved in the spirit of Judaism and in youth groups.

"He had a limited Jewish background, but went on the study at Yeshiva University, and to become a Talmud scholar."

Cherniak was invested in NCSY, said Newman, and his mission was to make sure the youth became, and remained connected to the Jewish People. He never gave up on that mission."

Cherniak leaves his wife Debbie, daughter Symee, seven grandchildren, his mother Lucy Cherniak-Weinstein, sister Linda Colman, and brothers Lloyd and Leon Cherniak.

CHALLAH BAKERS: On Jan. 30, the House ran its second annual Challah-palooza event, where more than 60 young Jewish professionals, including Lori Kagal and Alon Halbrich, baked hundreds of challahs that were later donated to several community organizations, including Out of the Cold and Jewish Family & Child. The event was part of the House's ongoing monthly Challah for Chesed series. [Snapshot Magnets photo]

Lone clergy on trip to Japan

Rabbi joins medical team to study palliative care

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

It was a "privilege beyond privilege" to exchange knowledge about palliative care with Japanese specialists while on a recent trip to that country, says Rabbi Rena Arshinoff.

She was part of a team of four Canadians from southern Ontario who travelled to Nagoya for three weeks last spring, sponsored by Rotary International, to study palliative care, learn from each other and share experiences.

She was the only clergy on the three-week trip to Japan, which also included a palliative care physician and two nurses.

"We were welcomed into the hospitals with open arms, and even the patients allowed us into their lives," she said in an interview.

Rabbi Arshinoff, 60, a Montreal native who is married with three children and one grandchild, was trained as a nurse, and did graduate work in epidemiology. She spent 20 years doing clinical research, until she became interested in working with people.

She got more immersed in Judaism when she was saying Kaddish for her father and had a bat mitzvah at age 48. She eventually entered Hebrew Union College, Jewish Institute of Religion, and was ordained in 2008.

Currently, she combines her interest in health care and rabbinics as a chaplain at Toronto Western Hospital in its neuroscience program, and she is pursuing a doctoral degree in palliative care from Lancaster University in England.

Rabbi Arshinoff is only the second rabbi in Canada to receive the credential of specialist in pastoral care from the Canadian Association for Spiritual Care.

She became interested in the field of palliative care, she said, because it makes up part of her main interests – grief, healing, rabbinics and chaplaincy.

"When I was approached by Rotary International to take part in the Japanese program, I immediately became excited. I was being given the opportunity of a lifetime. The Japanese delegation spent three weeks with us here, and we returned to Japan with them," she said.

She said the standards of medical care in Japan are comparable to North America's, but spiritual care is lacking.

"Japanese culture does not allow people to talk freely about death, dying and terminal illness," she said.

"Japan has state of the art machinery, CT scanners, MRI machines, radiation equipment, and advanced medical training, [but] what they lack and desperately want to learn is how to provide holistic and spiritual care to patients, their families, and health-care staff.

"They are aware that the spiritual component of health-care delivery is lacking in their model, and they want to learn from us. [Hearing this] was a affirmation of the work that I do."

Rabbi Arshinoff said that at each hospital the team visited, they were asked about spiritual support for nurses. "It was the first time that anyone ever had permission to talk about these issues."

In the west, we are more open and direct, "but not everyone is able to have these conversations easily. Immersing myself in Japanese culture taught me about palliative care there and here," she said.

Rabbi Rena Arshinoff in Japan

"Palliative care is a set of principles, which help provide people with dignity and the ability to make decisions. Professionals provide a wide range of support for people living with illness.

"It provides patients with the ability to plan their life the way they want to live. People can have a beautiful death, and we can help make it beautiful.

"We share the passion to help people, and we want them to have dignity and control. Illness has a way of taking control of people, and we like to be the masters of our own destiny."

In a dvar Torah she recently delivered at Congregation Darchei Noam, Rabbi Arshinoff said it's incumbent upon each of us to learn about other cultures if we are to understand the context in which people function.

"Sometimes there seems to be no words that offer comfort, and sometimes we don't know how to offer what words do exist. But we don't always need to offer words – we need to offer our presence. Even in silence, our presence speaks words."

Anne Frank exhibit underway in Vancouver

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre (VHEC) has opened a travelling exhibit from the Anne Frank House in Amsterdam. Titled Anne Frank – A History for Today, its opening night coincided with International Holocaust Remembrance Day on Jan. 28 and the 69th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz, Jan. 27, 1945.

It's the third exhibit on Anne Frank put on by VHEC over the past 20 years, "but we thought it was a timely opportunity to revisit this and contemplate why Anne Frank remains such an iconic figure for the 21st century," said Nina Krieger, executive director.

Anne Frank House sent Julie Couture, co-ordinator of Canadian projects for Anne Frank House, to Vancouver to assist with the exhibit's installation and docent training. The exhibit consists of up to 40 panels from Amsterdam containing reproductions of photos, documents and texts that narrate the background of the Holocaust and Anne Frank's story.

Portrait of Anne Frank, April 1941 (AFF Basel, CH / AFS Amsterdam, NL)

The exhibit is targeted primarily at students and teachers, Krieger said, with programs offered for grades 6 through 12 and a comprehensive teachers guide available on VHEC's website to support the school program with pre- and post-visit activities. More than 50 schools have booked the 90-minute tour to date, and each tour will be led by a docent. The centre requests a $100 fee per tour, but "no school is ever turned away on the basis of financial need," Krieger said.

The program also includes Out of the Archive: A Companion to Anne Frank – A History for Today, wherein a separate room contains artefacts from Vancouver's survivor community. Among the artefacts are two identity cards that belonged to the mother of Louise Sorenson, Krieger said. "One is stamped with a 'J' for Jew, while the other is her forged identity card that didn't have the 'J' stamp and allowed her to survive," Krieger said. There's also a recipe book containing recipes recorded from memory in Ravensbruck Concentration Camp. The recipe book speaks of writing as a form of resistance, linking it to Anne's resistance in diarizing her life.

"These items continue the conversation about childhood, faith, identity, rescue, hiding and resistance," Krieger said. "They are absolute treasures that we're thrilled to bring out for students and teachers to engage with."

The exhibit is open to the public weekdays and occasional Sundays, by donation. For information, visit www.vhec.org.

Jewish Learning: Jewish Living
Genuine Choice, Genuine Commitment

A multi-denominational course, ideal for those exploring the possibility of conversion to Judaism

Each person's journey towards Judaism is organic and individual. We invite you to explore Judaism and your growing relationship with it through the lenses of different Jewish denominations.

This course introduces the central Jewish ideas and practices, texts and experiences that form the foundation of a Jewish life. If you decide to pursue conversion, this course will give you the tools to choose an informed, healthy and whole commitment to Jewish living and the Jewish people.

This course is solely an educational endeavor. Enrolling does not guarantee conversion. An individual who chooses to pursue conversion will choose a mentoring rabbi/educator and will continue the process based on the rabbi/educator's specific denominational requirements.

Haredi sect to appeal Ontario court ruling

Jewish agencies ready to foster Lev Tahor kids

Jewish agencies in Montreal are ready to place 13 Lev Tahor children in appropriate temporary homes after an Ontario court ruling ordered them back to Quebec and into foster care, a Jewish community representative says.

Meanwhile, leaders of the controversial anti-Zionist haredi sect near Chatham, Ont., say they intend to appeal the Feb. 3 decision by Judge Stephen Fuerth of the Ontario Court of Justice. The group's lawyer, Chris Knowles, told The CJN the papers will be filed this week.

David Ouellette, associate director of Quebec public affairs at the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, which is speaking for other Jewish agencies on this issue, said his group welcomes the ruling, which upheld a November decision by a Quebec youth court judge that ordered 14 children from three Lev Tahor families to be placed in foster care for 30 days and assessed.

But Fuerth delayed the implementation of his ruling for the same amount of time in order to give the group an opportunity to prepare an appeal. (Fuerth's order exempted a 17-year-old mother named in the Quebec ruling, but not her infant child, because she's considered an adult under Ontario law.)

"We have full confidence in the Quebec authorities and in the ruling of the Quebec Superior Court, which was validated by the Ontario Court of Justice," Ouellette told The CJN.

"We're concerned about the well-being of the children, and we understand that the Department of Youth Protection [DYP] in Quebec has solid reasons to have these children removed and placed in foster families."

Ouellete said evidence presented by the DYP in Quebec "details cases of utter negligence toward the children," including allegations of forced underage marriage, failure to provide adequate education and inappropriate discipline of children using force.

He said Jewish social service agencies such as Agence Ometz and Batshaw Youth and Family Centres have been working closely with the DYP since last spring to provide it with Yiddish and Hebrew interpreters – the group's main spoken languages – and to find appropriate potential foster care for the children with haredi and chassidic families.

About 200 members of Lev Tahor left their enclave north of Montreal overnight on Nov. 17-18, a day before some of its members were to appear in youth court in Quebec about the allegations, and just days before the original court ruling there on Nov. 27. They settled near Chatham.

Sect leaders say the move had been planned since last spring in response to what they considered harassment by Quebec authorities over how its children were being educated.

But in the group's submission to the Ontario court, Fuerth noted, Lev Tahor leaders acknowledged that they "felt it necessary to have a contingency plan in the event that the Quebec government would initiate action such as the apprehension of our children."

Fuerth said in his ruling that "the manner and haste of the exit to Ontario… were more consistent with flight than an orderly and planned move."

The judge disagreed with the sect's argument that the Ontario court didn't have jurisdiction to enforce the Quebec order, saying it had to recognize it. "To do otherwise would simply encourage jurisdictional chaos as others try to escape the lawful processes where children habitually reside."

He also dismissed Charter of Rights claims by the group based on freedom of religion, movement and security of the person, saying the Quebec court was a more appropriate forum for such arguments, and that such rights need to be weighed against the rights of children to protection from harm.

Speaking to The CJN, Lev Tahor organizer Nachman Helbrans, son of the group's founder, Rabbi Shlomo Helbrans, admitted, "If there had not been court proceedings, maybe we would have waited a few months" to move, or sect members would have moved more gradually instead of en masse.

Helbrans said the group is "very disappointed" in the Ontario ruling.

"We are determined to file an appeal and to use all legal avenues open to us to bring justice," he said.

"There are many grounds to appeal this decision. There are many errors of facts and errors of law," he added, saying the group disagrees with the judge's finding the court had jurisdiction to rule on the case under Ontario law.

An appeal of the Quebec youth court decision is due to be heard Feb. 20.

Last week, a judge in Ste-Jerome, Que., ruled that evidence gathered in raids on the group in Quebec and Ontario could be made public. The ruling came in response to a petition by news outlets Postmedia, the Toronto Star, CBC, the Globe and Mail, CTV News, Sun Media and Shaw Media. Access to the material reportedly was granted because there were no objections to the request from Lev Tahor, the Crown or the DYP.

The Crown has until Feb. 14 to make the documents public and will likely redact the names of the children involved, as well as information that could harm its case, the news outlets lawyer told Postmedia.

Helbrans said that Lev Tahor continues to deny all the allegations being made against it, and that attempts to put its children in foster care, even with ultra-Orthodox families, are just a first step to eventually transferring them to secular homes and taking the "Lev Tahor chinuch [education] out of them."

He said some of the children in the community are having nightmares about being removed from their homes, which they've seen happen twice before, including late last year when two children were removed and later returned after social workers noticed what looked like a bruise on one child's face. Her mother said it was from a marker.

Helbrans said Lev Tahor leaders are trying to reassure the children "that Hakodesh Baruch Hu [God] saves Jewish kinder every time."

Helbrans also disclosed that the group has stopped co-operating with Chatham-Kent Children's Services, which had been closely monitoring Lev Tahor with near-daily visits since its arrival in the area.

The last visit was late last month, but the group is no longer co-operating with them, because they say they were intrusive and repetitive, and didn't turn up evidence of abuse or neglect.

The group's leaders were scheduled to meet with Children's Services representatives this week about their case.

Dubbed the "Jewish Taliban" because women in the sect have been seen wearing burka-like clothing, Lev Tahor contends the animosity toward it stems from its roots in Israel, and the fact it's openly anti-Zionist and believes only the Messiah can establish a Jewish state.

The group first moved to Quebec about 20 years ago. At the time, an Israeli official expressed concerns to Quebec news outlets about the welfare of its children.

Rabbi Helbrans, the group's founder, had served two years in jail after being convicted in New York of kidnapping a 13-year-old boy he'd been tutoring.

The group formed around him after he returned to Israel. Its original members are Israeli-born, but most of the children were born in this country.

Arabic channel hopes to find spot on Canadian dials

Al Jazeera seeks looser distribution restrictions

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Radio-Television Telecommunications Commission (CRTC) has asked for comments on a request by the Al Jazeera news network to remove restrictions the regulator has placed on its Arabic channel that have kept it off Canadian television.

The Qatar-based channel, which is owned by the emirate and has been accused of being anti-Semitic and anti-American, was approved for distribution in Canada in 2004 on the condition that all hate speech would be edited out of its broadcasts by potential cable and satellite distributors. Al Jazeera blames the added responsibility and high costs of monitoring the channel 24 hours a day, seven days a week, for its absence from Canadian TV screens.

Kimeran Daley, head of North American distribution for Al Jazeera, said there is a lot of demand for the Al Jazeera Arabic channel in Canada. The channel is currently available to Canadians online, and she said Canada ranks fourth in the number of people watching the stream on the Internet.

"It's really not a matter of entering the Canadian market. We're already here," she said. "We just want to make sure we're available on the TV in your living room."

From Al Jazeera Arabic channel (YouTube screenshot)

Martin Sampson, director of communications and marketing for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said he has concerns that some of the commentators on the network may be too anti-Semitic for Canadian airwaves.

He said he recently saw a clip where a commentator said the Holocaust was divinely inspired.

"My personal opinion is that's abusive, and most members of the Jewish community would find that to be unacceptable," he said.

Anita Bromberg, national director of legal affairs for B'nai Brith Canada, said her past concerns have included Al Jazeera broadcasts of people who are sympathetic to Holocaust denial and terrorism.

In response to whether the channel could guarantee it would be free of hate speech, Daley said the channel allows all sides of an issue to be represented in discussions.

"We encourage all members of the Canadian community, including the Jewish community, to use it as a platform," she said.

Right now, the channel is aired unedited in countries such as Israel, the United Kingdom and France, Daley said, adding that she hopes the company's "very high editorial standards" would satisfy Canadian broadcast policy.

Bromberg countered that Canadians may not be as knowledgeable on Middle East issues as Israelis, for example, and thus might not be able to recognize a bias against the Jewish state.

"As best as we can see now, subject to our further review, there remains reasons to be concerned that a monitoring system should be in place," she said, adding that she thinks a self-monitoring system similar to the one B'nai Brith helped put in place with the former Canadian Jewish Congress to monitor Al Jazeera English may be a good idea for the Arabic channel.

However, she said the high expense of monitoring, especially given the language barrier, should fall on the network, not the Jewish community.

She said B'nai Brith is reviewing the channel and working on outlining its concerns to the CRTC.

Sampson said although CIJA is still evaluating whether to submit comments to the CRTC, he hopes the commission will "apply their own regulations, and will do what's right… to ensure that Canadians aren't subject to abusive comment."

Kalkstein originally hired as an intake worker

"I was hired originally as an intake worker because I spoke fluent Yiddish," said Kalkstein, who was born in Germany after World War II to Holocaust survivors.

"The downtown Jewish population was about 8,000 when I moved down. Now it's somewhere around 20,000, and the demographics have changed. There is the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School and a thriving supplementary Hebrew school. There are a lot of young, middle-class families."

The clientele at his branch, however, is to a large extent made up of single parent families, alcoholics, drug addicts, as well as people who are disabled.

"We see the marginal population. As a United Way agency, anyone can come see us, but to receive assistance from UJA Federation [of Greater Toronto], they must be Jewish. The downtown branch carries almost 50 per cent of the agency's financial assistance."

Interrupting the meeting for a few minutes to talk to a man who needed money, Kalkstein said, "We see a little more of the underside of the world than most people. There are a lot of tzuris out there. We're reaching out in some way, but we're not solving big issues. Homelessness, mental health issues and poverty are still out there, but we're getting involved in people's lives and doing what we can."

Simon Kalkstein

When visiting one woman, Kalkstein said he often runs out to buy her food supplies. "Social workers don't typically shop for clients, but she can't get out. What does it hurt to help her out?"

He said that thanks to federation, he is able to give people money to help ward off situational homelessness.

An elderly man called him recently, he said, and told him his wife was being discharged from the hospital and needed help at home.

"If he hires help, though, he won't have money for rent," Kalkstein said.

"Years ago, he and his wife were in a shelter, and he asked me in Yiddish if they would have to move back. I had them get a letter from the landlord saying they couldn't pay their rent, and we got him some funds. Meanwhile, we arranged for his wife to get government money for subsequent months."

He said that too often, people have to make choices. "They can pay their rent, but not their hydro, they can eat but not pay their rent. We help cover them so they can carry on. We rescue them so they don't get in trouble."

There is often a pattern behind those who find themselves homeless, he said.

"I see a bright young man who had no education. He probably didn't finish Grade 8. He grew up with poverty and drugs in his life, and never really had a chance. He comes here and leaves some of his stuff with us, because he trusts me. He even has his mail forwarded here. We're a place of safety to him."

Toronto has a fairly affluent Jewish community, Kalkstein said, and federation has committed to help the poor. A recent $1-million donation to the agency, from Shirley Granovsky, will be designated toward helping break the cycle of poverty.

He said if he were a young social worker, "I would do this all over again. It's gratifying for me to be involved in acts of loving kindness. We are our brothers' keepers, and we have a sense of responsibility to them."

Cotler guided by parents' Jewish values

I am particularly proud of my time as minister, during which I introduced Canada's first law to combat human trafficking, crafted the Civil Marriage Act – landmark legislation that extended marriage equality to gays and lesbians, while at the same time, guaranteeing religious freedom – and made the quashing of wrongful convictions a priority.

During my tenure as minister, we democratized the process of appointment to the Supreme Court of Canada, appointed two outstanding women justices, making the Supreme Court of Canada the most gender representative supreme court in the world, while also appointing the first aboriginal justice and first visible minority justice to an appellate court.

Along the way, I was guided by Jewish values imparted in the teachings of my parents. Indeed, after being sworn in as minister, I began my media scrum stating that "I will be guided in my work by one over-arching principle, that of tzedek, tzedek tirdof – justice, justice shall ye pursue," which my father taught me "was equal to all the other commandments combined," to which my mother, hearing my father's teachings, would add: "If you want to pursue justice, you have to feel the injustice about you – and combat the injustice – otherwise pursuing justice is a theoretical abstraction."

Accordingly, I was guided in my work by such values as zachor – "remembrance" – which led to me proposing, and the House unanimously adopting, a motion to establish a National Day of Reflection on the Prevention of Genocide.

I was also taught early on by my mother, who exemplified this throughout her life, that "life and death are on the tip of the tongue," which led to my making the combating of incitement to hate and genocide a priority, launching the National Justice Initiative Against Racism and Hate, and founding and chairing the Inter-Parliamentary Coalition to Combat Anti-Semitism.

Another foundational Jewish value – "Thou shall not stand idly by while thy brothers' and sisters' blood is being shed" – inspired my involvement in the Responsibility to Protect Doctrine, and led to my chairing of the Save Darfur Parliamentary Coalition, Iran Accountability Week, the Inter-Parliamentary Group for Human Rights in Iran and the Justice for Sergei Magnitsky Interparliamentary Group.

Beyond 2015, I look forward to remaining active in public life, lecturing and writing on the issues of the day, advancing the causes of human rights and international justice in particular, protecting the vulnerable, working for gender equality and advocating on behalf of political prisoners – all anchored in Jewish values – efforts in which I have been engaged for over 35 years.

I believe Parliament is at its best when we put aside partisanship and incivility to work in common cause for the public good. Rancour and recrimination only serve to diminish public confidence in the institution, and we, as parliamentarians, owe it to Canadians to afford Parliament the dignity and respect it warrants.

I have been humbled by the expressions of support and words of encouragement from members of all parties, constituents, Canadians and beyond, since I made my decision public. It has truly been a privilege and an honour to serve – and I fortunately have 20 months left to go until the next election.

Irwin Cotler is the member of Parliament for Mount Royal and a professor emeritus of law at McGill University. On Feb. 5, he announced he would not seek re-election for a seventh term.

Let a thousand SodaStreams flow

Bernie Farber
Special to The CJN

The drive from the centre of Jerusalem to Ma'aleh Adumim is about 10 or 15 minutes depending on traffic – about the same as driving from Thornhill into Toronto. The really big difference is that Jerusalem and Ma'aleh Adumim (which literally means "Red Heights") are in Israel and the West Bank respectively. For those who have never been to Israel, it's difficult to describe the miniscule borders that separate Israel from the occupied territories (some prefer the term disputed territories).

Its name alone (as with most place names in Israel) denotes a pride of scriptural place. It describes the biblical line that separated the ancient tribes of Judah and Benjamin.

It's easily seen once one leaves Israel's Ben-Gurion Airport and travels north up through the Judean Hills into the Jordan Valley. As you gaze in wonder at the Jerusalem stone cliffs and the "reddish hues" that both give the town its name and mark the way to Judaism's most holy city, signs for Ma'aleh Adumim can be seen along Route 1 and 458 just before you enter Jerusalem proper.

It was started a couple years after the Yom Kippur War, undoubtedly as a means by which to expand Israel's defensive base (part of the reason for settlement developments in the early years), and the government soon gave it official recognition as a municipality, and by 1991, it had gained city status, the first Israeli city in the occupied territories.

Today it is a prosperous, growing community with a population of more than 35,000, slightly larger than Unionville Ont. A short seven kilometres to Jerusalem, it's like driving from Bathurst and Steeles to Lawrence Avenue.

And yet it's this tiny seven-kilometre stretch that makes all the difference. The occupied territories remain the Achilles heel of both Israel and the Palestinian Authority. The short boundaries between Israel and the PA, bordered on all sides by security fences and walls (indeed, in 2003 a road connecting Ma'aleh Adumim to Jerusalem was opened that included large tunnels running under the Hebrew University making it safer for Israelis to avoid terrorists' Molotov cocktails and rifle shots), remains a tragic problem in need of a creative solution

And it is Ma'aleh Adumim that today finds itself in the middle of yet another occupied territories controversy, one that includes a large Israeli company, Hollywood starlet Scarlett Johansson and the international relief agency OXFAM.

By now we all know the story. SodaStream, one of Israel's most successful international companies, is represented by Johansson as part of its marketing plan. Makers of the largest home carbonation system in the world, it sells its product worldwide in more than 65 countries. It's environmentally friendly, it's healthy and great value for the buck. I have one in my own home and love it.

The problem: SodaStream's largest factory is situated in Ma'aleh Adumim. It has become the poster child for those involved in the ill-conceived boycott, sanctions and divestment (BDS) movement against anything Israeli. This all came to a head with a clever SodaStream advertisement that ran during last week's Super Bowl game with Johansson fronting the product. OXFAM, choosing to see the trees as opposed to the whole forest, cut its ties with Johansson, because it saw her role with the company as "incompatible" with its own role as "honest brokers" for humanitarian issues.

Yet the SodaStream controversy in many ways shines some needed light on and even helps us understand both the futility of BDS and the tragedy of the occupation.

SodaStream machine

True, Ma'aleh Adumim is in occupied territory, and true, SodaStream's location there violates accepted norms. But it's also true that SodaStream is a decent employer, providing jobs for hundreds of Israelis and Palestinians at fair and equal wages. Many in the BDS movement have demanded that, along with employers like SodaStream, Israeli academics, artists and politicians must be banned and boycotted. I suspect I will hear from many when I write that boycotts dealing with Israel and the PA further exacerbate and fog a necessary solution.

Throwing Palestinian workers out of needed jobs is not the answer. And continuing Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's policy of building Israeli housing on occupied land is certainly a road fraught with disaster.

In my view, SodaStream is exactly the model that both Israel and the PA should embrace: Israelis and Palestinians working side by side as equals, seeing each other as co-workers, neighbours and friends. Such an endeavour bodes well for future growth in a neighbourhood that can use positive outcomes.

With the world's attention on Ma'aleh Adumim, real questions can be asked, complexities analyzed. We can examine the tragedy of being an occupying power and the need to negotiate a dignified solution to end an occupation that very few want to see continue.

In the end, understandings could be brought to bear that Ma'aleh Adumim and other Jewish settlements close to Jerusalem are integral to the Israeli and Palestinian economies. Focus can be placed on the absolute need to creatively design a land swap that helps fashion a contiguous Palestinian state that can thrive side by side with Israel, where many SodaStreams can flourish and change hard-held paradigms.

A Canadian triumph over terror

Stockwell Day
JNS.org

Israeli security units are legendary for their formidable defense capabilities. As a former minister of public safety (including anti-terrorism) for Canada, I encouraged joint training and intelligence sharing between our nations' intelligence and protection services. As such, I am well acquainted with the Israeli expertise in this area.

It was with that acute level of respectful awareness that I considered the following question: Would I be able to breach the security perimeter around Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper at a state dinner in Jerusalem in order to introduce him to two uninvited guests?

Who were these two erstwhile individuals? For security reasons, I can't divulge their names. But I can tell you that they were preteen Israeli boys who had each lost their fathers in a ruthless terrorist attack in an Israeli civilian neighborhood.

My wife and I met these young men just three days earlier at a Shabbat meal hosted by our friends, Marc and Chantal Belzberg. As Christians, we were honored to be invited by the Belzbergs to join their family and friends for a few wonderful hours. It was an evening that we shall always cherish.

I will resist the urge to go into great detail describing the sumptuous meal; the warmth of hospitality that makes the phrase "please feel at home" more than a mantra; and the moving readings, prayers, and singing that embraced us. Instead, I will focus on the boys.

They were at the meal with more than a dozen of their friends and counselors. You see, Marc and Chantal run an organization known as OneFamily (www.onefamilytogether.org). Its mandate, briefly put, is to provide love, encouragement, and extensive supportive programming to victims of terror and their families, with a focus on children who have lost parents or other family members at the hands of terrorists.

On the surface, this rambunctious "band of brothers" at our meal looked and sounded like any other group of preteens and adolescents. Laughing, cajoling, arm-twisting, and teasing were constants throughout the meal. But as they respectfully gathered around the table to pray and sing under Marc's leadership, the playful surface melted away.

Reflecting on the two boys specifically, as sad stories unfolded, I was deeply moved as I remembered countless special moments with my own father which these boys would never savour with theirs.

I remember wrestling matches on the floor of our home, trying hilariously to pin down my father's giant arms. Or slapping my sister's arm when she had pulled my hair and feeling my father's strong hand pull me away and his serious tone when he warned me to "never hit a girl." Or racing around the final turn of the 1,500-meter event at the school track meet, my legs and lungs fading and on fire, with my rival in close pursuit and suddenly my father's shout of "You can do it!" amidst the crowd pushing me towards the finish line.

They would never experience the feeling of phoning "Dad" from the maternity ward and proudly informing him that he was now a grandfather. Or seeking sage advice about the risks of a possible career move. These boys will never know such moments with their natural fathers.

But the dedication exhibited by the Belzbergs and their many volunteers will help to bridge the emotional and spiritual divide. Children like these will move into an adulthood that will be far more comforting, stable, and fulfilling than it would have been without OneFamily.

So, when the boys asked me breathlessly if there was any chance they could shake hands with this prime minister, a man whom they had heard proclaim on the news that he would always stand "shoulder to shoulder" with Israel, I had to at least try.

Not wanting to raise issues of national security, an amateurish plan began to unfold.

On the night of the state dinner, Marc showed up with the two hopeful boys in tow. As all guests have to be cleared many days in advance, it was no small feat for Marc to convince security on the ground at the hotel that these two wide-eyed interlopers posed no existential threat.

Next, we were met by the amazing coincidence that a high-ranking minister standing in the reception line had served in the military with one of the deceased dads. The boys were ushered to the final perimeter and then handed off to me.

Suddenly, the phalanx of iron-armed, square-jawed secret service agents surrounded Prime Minister Harper and began quickly steering him towards the exit. But two of the lead officers recognized me, saw the boys, and gave me a quick nod and a gap that allowed me to lean to the prime minister's ear and give him a 10-second briefing. He stopped the entourage, reached past the guards, grasped the boys' hands, and thanked them heartily for being there with him. And then he was gone.

The encounter left the boys breathless and ecstatic. It left Marc beaming like a solar flare. And it left me with an unspeakable sense of gratitude that there are people like Marc, Chantal, and their family, who are dedicated to shining precious light into otherwise darkened situations.

Stockwell Day is the former leader of Canada's Official Opposition and a former cabinet minister serving in the government of Stephen Harper. He also served as minister of public safety, minister of international trade, minister for the Asia-Pacific, and president of the treasury board. Day now runs the Stockwell Day Connex consulting agency and is a political commentator and an international speaker.

Transit, school funding, hydro on agenda

Thornhill voters head to polls

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

The riding of Thornhill, geographically the same federally and provincially, has the highest percentage of Jews of any electoral district in Canada, at 36.6 per cent of the population (just eclipsing Mount Royal, at 36.3 per cent).

Thus, Prime Minister's Stephen Harper's coattails are evident here.

Thornhill elected Conservative Peter Kent as its MP in the past two federal elections, while Peter Shurman, also a Tory, was elected as its MPP in the last two provincial votes. (In 2011, Shurman defeated Liberal hopeful Bernie Farber, a past CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, by nearly seven percentage points.)

Shurman's resignation late last year over an expenses flap paved the way for Gila Martow, a 52-year-old optometrist and community activist, to be the Conservative standard bearer in the Feb. 13 byelection.

She will face Liberal contender Sandra Yeung Racco, 53, the City of Vaughan's councillor in Ward 4. Yeung Racco's husband, Mario Racco, was Thornhill's MPP until Shurman defeated him in 2007.

Making her second run for office in the riding is the NDP candidate, Cindy Hackelberg, a 35-year-old high-tech software project manager who polled about nine per cent of votes in 2011.

The Green Party is running Teresa Pun, a doctor. In the last election, the Greens received about 1.7 per cent of the vote in the riding.

Over the last five years, the riding's population has increased by 10,000 to about 140,000. It has a sizeable Russian and Israeli presence, and is home to many synagogues, Jewish schools and community facilities.

The CJN presented each candidate with a list of the following questions:

THE CANDIDATES / THE QUESTIONS	Cindy Hackelberg NDP	Gila Martow PC	Teresa Pun Green	Sandra Yeung Racco Liberal
TRANSIT: What is your plan to improve transit in the riding? The VivaNext plan calls for two subway extensions, two light rail transit (LRT) lines, and a bus rapid transit (BRT) network featuring dedicated lanes for Viva vehicles. Do you favour all, parts or none of this plan? And should municipalities that benefit shoulder some of the funding?	Families shouldn't be hit with new taxes and tolls they can't afford, while the government moves ahead with more corporate tax loopholes and sky-high CEO salaries. New Democrats support effective transit for Thornhill, including the subway extensions, but we don't believe that families should be asked to pay more, at the same time as the government opens new loopholes.	We are committed to building the subway north to Richmond Hill. That's a promise, and we keep our promises... We need more north-south express rapid transit, not east-west bus lanes. That creates traffic chaos and damages business activities in neighbourhoods.	Improving transit in the riding and region is critical to getting our economy moving again. I support the VivaNext plan, and regionally the Big Move plan, including the extension of the subway to Richmond Hill. The Green Party of Ontario will dedicate at least 2 per cent of the transportation budget to active transportation.	People are tired of wasting precious hours trapped in traffic when they could be spending time with their families or be productive at work... The Liberal government understands the importance of funding transit infrastructure in York Region... Thornhill needs continued transit funding, not cutting projects like the PCs propose.
TUITION: Tuition at private, faith-based schools is an issue in the riding, particularly among Jewish voters. What can you promise to ease the plight of parents of children in these schools?	A faith-based system will not solve the problem of inadequate funding. New Democrats are committed to fair provincial funding for the existing school systems so they can serve students' needs first.	Obviously I understand and I sympathize with the parents who are struggling, but we are focused on the economy and job growth and ending traffic gridlock. [She said she has no plan to bring back the equity in education tax credit, introduced by the Tories under Mike Harris in 2001 and repealed by the Liberals under Dalton McGuinty in 2003.]	It's unfair to members of all religious communities that we are currently publicly funding a separate Catholic school system and not others in addition to a public system. The Green party supports a single public education system with French and English school boards.	Ontario Liberals are committed to strengthening our public education system... We're also giving our youngest learners the best start possible: full-day kindergarten– the first program of its kind in North America.
HYDRO: Hydro rates are reportedly set to increase by about 40 per cent. How will you work to keep increases to a minimum, and what role do you think the gas plant scandal has played in higher rates?	It's clear that the Liberals and Conservatives are more interested in well-connected private power interests than in bringing down rates for the people and businesses who pay the bills.	The Liberal government has made a mess of our energy sector, and that's what's causing the increases.	We believe that Ontario consumers and taxpayers shouldn't have to pay the bill for energy mismanagement. We would implement programs and legislation to help people save money by saving energy, such as building retrofits and conservation measures. We have long advocated for Ontario to import existing low-cost, clean water power from Quebec.	Over the past 10 years, the government has invested heavily in our electricity system, which was in desperate need of being fixed after years of PC neglect, and we now have cleaner, more modern and more reliable sources of power generation... The premier has been open and transparent about the gas plant relocations and has put in place new rules to ensure it doesn't happen again.
JOB CREATION: Where do you stand on job creation in the riding - and how to retain existing jobs?	New Democrats have proposed a Job Creator Tax Credit that will reward companies creating jobs and investing in Ontario... We know that small businesses form the backbone of our economy, and that's why it's time to cut the small business tax rate.	Job creation and economic growth are about having programs in place so that small businesses are not strangled by red tape... It's about mentoring, helping the next generation get the jobs they're passionate about.	Thornhill is establishing itself as a strong R & D corridor. I believe that governments can – and should – support smart growth and social progress with economic policy.	I want to focus on three areas in particular: continuing to invest in opportunities for young people through programs like the Youth Jobs Strategy; ensuring that small businesses have the support they need to thrive; and continuing to invest in smart infrastructure projects.

BYELECTION

Two Liberals back Tory candidate in race

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

Two high-profile Jewish Liberals have thrown their support behind the Conservative candidate in the Feb. 13 byelection in Thornhill.

Susan Kadis, who represented the riding as a Liberal MP from 2004 to 2008, and Joel Hertz, vice-chair of the York Region District School Board, have endorsed Tory hopeful Gila Martow in the provincial vote.

"I believe in Gila," Kadis told The CJN. "I believe in her capacity to bring the issues Thornhill cares about to the forefront. She has that strong desire and dedication to our community."

Asked about a Liberal endorsing a Conservative, Kadis said, "I think it really speaks to her character, integrity and commitment she's shown to our community."

Kadis herself sought the provincial Liberal nomination in Thornhill in 2003, but was defeated by Mario Racco, who won and served as an MPP until 2007. Racco is the husband of the current Liberal candidate in the byelection, Vaughan city councillor Sandra Yeung Racco.

Susan Kadis

In 2006, Kadis withdrew her support for then-federal Liberal leadership hopeful Michael Ignatieff after he accused Israel of committing war crimes in Lebanon. Kadis later endorsed Bob Rae.

In an email to The CJN, Hertz said: "I believe Gila is the best person for the position of Thornhill MPP. She is extremely hard-working, very aware of the riding's needs and excellent in communicating. That she is Jewish cannot but help her in a riding that is 40 per cent Jewish.

"I am normally a strong Liberal, federally and provincially," Hertz continued. "However, in this byelection, I am making a selection not based on party, but based on the candidates."

Yeung Racco downplayed the issue, telling The CJN she has been endorsed by other Liberals, including former MP Elinor Caplan and former Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber, who ran unsuccessfully for the Ontario Liberals in the last election.

Also supporting Martow are Aaron Blumenfeld and Ira Walfish, advocates for public funding of Jewish day schools.

While government help for faith-based private schools is not a front-burner issue in this election, "it will be far better served down the road with the election of Gila Martow, who will not be shy about advocating for the issue," Blumenfeld and Walfish said in a Jan. 27 statement.

Meanwhile, Martow's Facebook page was scrubbed of an anti-Islamic group of which she had been a member.

The CJN noticed her membership in "Stop the creation of an Islamic State within Israel" hours after its Jan. 28 interview with her. The group was created in late December by Meir Weinstein, head of the militant Jewish Defence League in Canada.

After The CJN asked Kadis about the link, it was purged from Martow's Facebook page.

In a subsequent email, Ari Laskin, Martow's spokesperson, explained that Martow "is added to Facebook groups frequently. Due to the nature of groups on Facebook, one must opt out of the group and can be added by anyone at any time."

Martow "is committed to representing all residents in this diverse riding," Laskin added.

Hertz later wrote to say that while he supports Martow, he is "not in favour" of the JDL. "There is a limit to 'just because it is Jewish, it is OK.'"

Yiddish Book Center launches new website

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

The National Yiddish Book Center in Amherst, Mass., recently launched Taytsh.org, a new website to help Yiddish translators improve their skills, build an online dictionary of unusual words and phrases, and discuss lexical fine points with their peers around the globe.

For Aaron Lansky, president and founder of the Yiddish Book Center, the new website for translators is one of several exciting "tectonic shifts" that he foresees in the next few years.

He announced at last summer's Jewish genealogy conference in Boston that Yiddish, in the next four years, "will take its place as the first completely digitalized and accessible literature in human history."

The Yiddish Book Center is reportedly in the final stages of perfecting an optical character recognition (OCR) software system for Yiddish that will make all of its 40,000 unique rescued Yiddish titles and 3,000 Yiddish periodicals fully searchable by keyword.

"You can type in any search term – the name of your family, a place name, anything you want – and it will instantly search five million pages of Yiddish literature," Lansky said. "Research that would have taken 10 years can be done in 10 seconds. This is coming very very soon."

Aided by generous grants from Steven Spielberg, the centre began scanning books around 1997. Teams of workers scanned books in three shifts a day for four years to complete the task. Special machines were used that could scan both sides of the page at once, and sometimes "we had to clean the glass after each scan because the books were crumbling," Lansky said.

They also had to cut the spines off some books in order to feed the pages through. Lansky called the process "the General Westmoreland school of digitalization – we had to destroy the book in order to save it."

Although not searchable, more than 11,000 Yiddish works are now accessible free of charge via the "internet archive" website, internetarchive.org. The online works have been downloaded about 500,000 times, according to Lansky: not bad for a language supposedly in its death throes.

The Yiddish Book Center has been training large numbers of students to undertake translations of the 98 per cent of the titles on its shelves that have not yet been translated. "The good news is that an ever-growing number of younger and non-native Yiddish speakers, both inside and outside the academy, are seeking out training and opportunities to translate Yiddish texts," he said.

Tevye, the central character in Sholem Aleichem's Tevye stories, "sometimes quotes the biblical saying, 'Ain chadash tachas hashemesh' there is nothing new under the sun," Lansky observed. "I think the Bible's got it wrong. The truth is there are all sorts of things that are new under the sun."

Israel, Jews and the Wiki wars

Jewish & Digital
Mark Mietklewicz

It's the sixth most popular website on the planet. It has become the go-to repository for information, replacing venerable – and dusty – encyclopedias. And it's where controversy over Israel and Judaism are a daily affair.

Welcome to the Wikipedia edit wars.

If you are like most people, you visit Wikipedia to read up on practically any topic under the sun. While the text may seem pretty sedate and respectful, each page has tabs labelled "Talk" and "View history," where you are likely to discover cauldrons boiling with arguments, sarcasm and worse. That's where Wikipedia editors hash out controversial content and attempt to reach some type of consensus.

A typical debate raging behind the scenes is whether the Wikipedia "Israel" page should carry an infobox describing Tel Aviv as the country's "second capital." [bit.ly/wikiwars6] Or whether Jerusalem should be described as "the third-holiest city in Islam" or "generally considered the third-holiest city in Islam." [bit.ly/wikiwars7]

Jimmy Wales, co-founder of Wikipedia, has noticed these debates, but he's not worried that accuracy is being warped. "Topics relating to Israel and Palestine are… in the group of articles that are always heavily edited, heavily discussed, heavily debated… and of course it will happen every day that someone will come in with an agenda, in any direction, trying to push that agenda, but the community is quite vigilant about trying to be neutral, trying to follow reliable sources, and I think in general we succeed." [bit.ly/wikiwars1]

Wales is referring to some of the ground rules designed to keep Wikipedia content as accurate – and the discussion as civil – as possible. If you follow them, you too are welcome to join in. But break a rule, and your contribution will probably disappear in minutes. Here's a tutorial to get you going editing Wikipedia. [bit.ly/wikiwars2]

You don't have to be passionate about Israel to find debate. Researchers recently sized up the 10 most controversial topics in each of the most popular language versions of Wikipedia. Here's a sampling of topics causing waves: Circumcision (English), Muhammad (Arabic), Adolf Hitler (German), Criticism of the Qur'an (Persian), Telepathy (Czech), Islamophobia (French). The full research is available online and is a fascinating read. [bit.ly/wikiwars3]

What do Israelis (or at least Hebrew-speakers) like to argue about in Wikipedia? Just about everything from religion to politics, with some sports thrown in for good measure. Here are the Top 10 controversial entries in the Hebrew Wikipedia:

10. Ariel Sharon
9. Beitar Jerusalem F.C. (football club)
8. Gaza War
7. Daphni Leef (Israeli social activist and organizer of a Tel Aviv tent camp, sparking the 2011 housing protests in Israel.)
6. Jewish settlement in Hebron
5. Benjamin Netanyahu
4. B'Tselem (Israeli non-governmental organization)
3. 2006 Lebanon War
2. Chabad messianism
1. Chabad

[bit.ly/wikiwars4]

Sometimes, arguments are best kept in the family. Over at the "Judaism" entry, some people feel there are too many photos depicting Ashkenazi-oriented Jewish objects. How's this rebuttal: "Like which photo? The shofar, the chanukiyah, the mezuzah, the Jerusalem sukkah? If these objects are Ashkenazi-oriented, you seem to imply that Sephardi people don't do mitzvot!… Take your inferiority complex somewhere else, please." [bit.ly/wikiwars5]

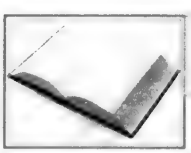
To love is divine

Rabbi David Cadoch



Rabbinic Reflections

I often wonder how it's possible to love what you cannot see. This a demand made to us by the Almighty. Our Torah speaks of loving the Almighty, and we base this love on the testimony of our forbearers and receiving the Torah at Mount Sinai. Our faith is based on our great liberation from slavery, culminating by what we heard standing around the mountain of God.

Human nature is such that we become attached to the things our senses can detect and imbue with value.

The fact is that the real meaning of love is a matter of giving. The focus of our giving becomes the love that is nurtured. Whether it's the work we invest in, the family we raise, or friendships we build, all these are based on the power of giving.

So, having said this, how are we to understand the love of God? If love follows the direction of giving, do we give to God? Or is He the one that gives to us and, therefore, shows His love for us by gracing us with the beauty of the full spectrum of life? Is love then an appreciation of what we take or receive? It may be, however, that taking can become so selfish that it loses all sense of appreciation, and, therefore, we must conclude that receiving is not the essence of love.

We return to the original question: how can we love what we do not see? Even a memory lives on from a past existence. In order to understand this enigma, we must understand that love is a spiritual quality that is expressed in the physical world in many different ways.

We were created in the image of God and, therefore, possess divine powers. One divine power is the capacity to love. When we decide to live moral lives and make integrity and honesty our model, we in fact are giving back love to its source – the spiritual realm. This form of giving awakens our spiritual sensitivity, and we find that a subtle bond of attachment is formed with what is holy and divine, and this awakens the love of God.

All this refined connection is infinitely intricate and so delicately balanced as to reciprocate this give and take, and this is what we call love. We try to bring this kind of balance to our marriage, our family and our circle of friends. It involves so much care and selflessness.

So if love is a spiritual quality, then loving is a divine act of giving!

Rabbi David Cadoch is spiritual leader of Beth HaRambam Synagogue at Donald Berman Maimonides Hospital in Montreal.

3D printing and civil society

From the Reut Institute
Jude Jacob

In the past few years, 3D printing has filled the headlines and changed the way we think about objects and production. In recent months, we've witnessed the production of shoes, houses, chocolates, jewelry and even human ears. Not long ago, this all seemed like science fiction, but today, all of this is real and forever expanding. Who knows what will be next? Already NASA has adopted 3D printing to make tools, and even spacecraft.

There's no question that this new printing technology is remarkable, and many see it as an alternative to mass production. It's essentially environmentally friendly, since each object is created individually, layer by layer, which means there's no need for wasteful moulds or long production lines.

Moreover, objects can be specially designed by users to meet their needs. For example, if you see a piece of jewelry you like, but desperately want your name on it, or a vase that's perfect for a friend but just needs a few changes, you can simply modify the design and print your own. And more than that, if you have a disability that makes it difficult to use certain objects, you can simply use a 3D printer to print your own special, customized objects.

But the really remarkable thing is that in Israel and across the world, communal technological spaces are opening up. These are new places that bring together 3D printing and other technologies in a bottom-up, increasingly accessible and also open-source way. The fact that these new spaces espouse open source means that if I solve a pressing need today in one location – say I develop a new type of cutlery with a special grip for people with a specific disability – someone in a different communal space can open up my design, change it as they see fit and print their own. New designs can be easily built and easily modified. This is a powerful tool for sharing knowledge and solving global problems.

In Israel, this is a revolution. While the top-down high-tech community, in which a small number of people benefit from the fruits of growth, have of course picked up the technology and continually use it for prototyping and making professional products, the creation of communal technological spaces means that 3D printing is now accessible to the general public. These spaces provide the tools and education for a wide range of people to learn about these new technologies. And most importantly, civil society is taking the lead on this issue.

Israel's "maker" culture and community of "learning through doing" has been around for a while and was once very niche, a community limited to the tech-savvy and to not-always-accessible, do-it-yourself pursuits. Today, however, 3D technologies are increasingly available, easy to use and relatively cheap, and Israel's "maker" community is rapidly expanding.

Community-oriented 3D printing is, therefore, a perfect vehicle to bring together different communities around problem solving and learning by doing. These new communal spaces stand to greatly benefit Israel's socio-economic and geographic periphery by providing access to new tools and technologies. Ultimately, these new spaces harness 3D technologies to benefit the community, and the technological revolution offers a unique opportunity for Israel's civil society to take hold of new technologies and use them as tools for education, leadership and coexistence.

How we relate to God

From the Bimah
Rabbi Joe Kanofsky

A minor controversy has erupted in the Anglo-Jewish press in recent weeks over women in two New York Jewish day schools expressing a desire to wear tfillin at the school's morning prayers. Truth is, most Jews don't put on tfillin at all, ever. Some have therefore said that we ought to applaud these young women's "search for spirituality."

And yet, there is an angle to this story that has not been addressed in any opinion pieces or blogs that I've seen. It's really one of the big questions of modern Jewish life, and in a nutshell it is: is spiritual seeking on my terms or on God's terms?

I learned long ago that "the devil can cite Scripture for his purpose," as Shakespeare wrote in The Merchant of Venice. I recall reading the words of a Jewish journalist writing about his stay in a resort hotel in the South Pacific. He explained to the manager that he would be observing a special day of rest (a Shabbat, of sorts) that Friday night and Saturday, so the thoughtful hotel hostess brought him a sumptuous meal of a steaming bowl of rice covered with shrimp. The writer was very moved by her hachnassat orchim (welcoming guests)! Feeling a sense of kavod haberiyot (honour for humankind), how could he refuse her hospitality? He ate the whole thing. Not only can we do whatever we like, the cleverer among us can even fool ourselves into thinking that it's a mitzvah.

The question remains: on whose terms is the spiritual pursuit undertaken? The modern view is: whatever makes you feel good and doesn't hurt others. If I find comfort and meaning in eastern spirituality, Hindu texts, Sufi meditation, why not? It's all good. That salad bar of spiritual tidbits is the meagre meal of the contemporary spiritual seeker.

But if I seek a relation on God's terms, then it must be not merely what makes me happy (although Jews are supposed to be happy). It should be what God wants. How do I know what God wants? The Jewish understanding of this over the past 3,000 years is called Torah.

Even though I believe that I'd feel more "spiritual" on a mountaintop in the Himalayas, Torah tells me, "What's wrong with a minyan right here in Toronto?" If I feel that tfillin should be green, made of 100 per cent post-consumer product, inscribed with Wordsworth's poetry, and wrapped around my leg, Torah tells me: sorry – black, leather, Shema, and the arm and head.

I'm fond of using the example: if you want to call or email me, I can give you my phone number or my email address. If you call a number that is "more meaningful" to you, even if it's off by one digit, you won't reach me. You may reach someone else and have a wonderful conversation, but if your hope was to contact me, only one cellphone number will get you through. And if you forget the dot in my email address, the message won't go anywhere. Only if you write the address or dial the phone number exactly as I tell you, will you be able to connect. So it is with Torah and mitzvot.

If the quest for "spirituality" is about connecting with something beyond ourselves, larger than ourselves, it's only effective when we reach out to the Divine on Divine terms, not human terms. That's the issue missing from most of contemporary discussion about modern Jewish practice and how we relate to God.

Israel, Turkey close to normalizing relations

JTA

JERUSALEM — Turkey and Israel are close to normalizing bilateral relations for the first time since the 2010 Mavi Marmara incident, Turkey's foreign minister said.

"There has recently been a momentum and new approach in compensation talks. We could say that most of the differences have been removed recently in these discussions," Turkish Foreign Minister Ahmet Davutoglu said in a TV interview on Sunday, the Hurriyet Daily News reported.

Ahmet Davutoglu (Wikimedia Commons)

Davutoglu said "serious progress had been achieved."

He did not say when the talks would be finalized and did not announce the amount of compensation to the victims of the incident or their families that was being discussed. That amount has been the source of a great deal of tension in the negotiations.

The foreign minister also noted that there has been an easing of the Israeli blockage on goods entering and leaving Gaza, which had been a condition for normalizing relations with the Jewish state.

Turkey downgraded diplomatic ties with Israel and then expelled Israel's ambassador after the 2010 flotilla incident, in which Israeli troops killed nine Turkish nationals when it moved to stop the Mavi Marmara from breaking Israel's blockade of Gaza.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu apologized to Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan in March 2013, after which representatives of the countries met for reconciliation talks.

Haredim protest funding freeze

JTA

JERUSALEM — Haredi demonstrators protesting cuts in funding over draft deferrals clashed with police in Jerusalem late last week.

The haredim also were protesting the arrest of a haredi Orthodox yeshiva student for draft dodging.

Major protests were held as well in Bnei Brak and Ashdod.

In Jerusalem, there were about a dozen arrests after protesters hurled bottles and stones at officers, according to reports.

The demonstrations came after Israel's Supreme Court earlier in the week froze nearly $3 million in funding to haredi yeshivas until the government stops military deferments for their students and passes a new law on drafting yeshiva students.

The funding was to be withheld from yeshivas with students aged 18 to 20 who have received draft notices since last summer, but did not appear for their induction. But on Feb. 6, Israeli Finance Minister Yair Lapid halted all funding to the yeshivas, including freezing payments already transferred earlier in the week for the February disbursement, after discovering that the money was still being used for those students.

The Yesh Atid party, headed by Lapid, made universal draft legislation, which it also calls the "Sharing the Burden" law, one of its major campaign issues.

The Tal Law, which allowed haredi men to defer army service indefinitely, was invalidated by the Supreme Court in February 2012 and expired in August that year. Haredi yeshiva students since then have had their drafts deferred.

A government committee headed by MK Ayelet Shaked of the Jewish Home party is working to finish revising a universal draft law, which already has passed its first reading in the Knesset.

Iranian TV airs simulated bombings of Israel

Ilan Ben Zion
The Times of Israel

Iranian state TV ran a documentary Feb. 7 featuring a computerized video of Iran's drones and missiles bombing Tel Aviv, Haifa, Ben-Gurion Airport and the Dimona nuclear reactor in a hypothetical retaliation for an Israeli or American strike on the Islamic Republic.

Iranian drones and missiles are also shown carrying out simulated strikes on the American aircraft carrier USS Abraham Lincoln, downing U.S. aircraft and striking American military targets in the Persian Gulf.

The clip was broadcast amid a clear escalation of anti-American rhetoric and action by Iran. On Feb. 8, an Iranian admiral announced that Iran had dispatched warships to the North Atlantic, while Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, denounced the Americans as liars who, while professing to be friends of Iran, would bring down his regime if they could. He also said it was "amusing" that the United States thought Iran would reduce its "defensive capabilities."

The film, titled The Nightmare of Vultures, opens with Khamenei addressing military academy graduates in 2011, warning: "Anybody who thinks of attacking the Islamic Republic of Iran should be prepared to receive strong slaps and iron fists from the armed forces."

Simulated attack by Iran on Ben-Gurion Airport in Tel Aviv [YouTube screenshot]

"And America, its regional puppets and its guard dog – the Zionist regime – should know that the response of the Iranian nation to any kind of aggression, attacks or even threats will be a response that will make them collapse from within," the film shows him saying.

Set to dramatic music, the video shows Iranian drones and missiles carrying out strikes against Tel Aviv's Kikar Hamedina square, the Azrieli Towers skyscrapers, and the IDF's Kirya central command complex, as well as Ben-Gurion International Airport, Haifa's Technion, several army and air force bases, and the nuclear reactor in Dimona.

The strike on Israel's central command building is shown taking place while former prime minister Ehud Olmert and former defence minister Amir Peretz – who served in that capacity during the 2006 Second Lebanon War – are inside convening a meeting.

The clips of drone strikes on Israel are interspersed with shots of Israeli emergency personnel evacuating injured Israeli civilians and soldiers while air raid sirens wail.

A barrage of missiles brings down Tel Aviv's skyscrapers in a final blow.

Afterward, Iranian drones and missiles are show attacking the aircraft carrier USS Abraham Lincoln on its way through the Strait of Hormuz into the Persian Gulf. Iranian drones are shown downing several American aircraft before sinking the U.S. capital ship. Zooming out to a map of the Middle East marked with U.S. military bases, Iranian missiles are then shown striking American military targets across the Persian Gulf.

In November, Iranian state television aired a shorter animated clip showing Iranian missiles targeting Israeli cities.

Iranian leaders have made repeated threats to wipe Israel off the map and have threatened to annihilate Tel Aviv if Iran's nuclear facilities are attacked by the West.

West Bank businesses flourish despite boycott

Ben Sales
JTA

TEL AVIV — Of the 200,000 wine bottles Yakov Burg produced last year, 16,000 went to Europe.

The possibility of a boycott and repeated rumblings that Europe is planning to label goods produced in the settlements could decrease that number, but Burg isn't worried.

The CEO of Psagot Winery, which is located in a settlement of the same name in the hills of the central West Bank, Burg prides himself on running a Jewish-owned business in the West Bank, even welcoming groups of Christian Zionists who want to volunteer during the harvest.

The winery's location, though, also makes it a prime target for boycotts aimed at goods produced in the settlements.

"There are a lot of places that won't buy the wine, so of course there's damage," Burg told JTA. "It doesn't scare me. We need to fight the boycott, not just do what they want."

The effort to boycott goods produced in the West Bank, long an objective of anti-Israel activists and some Jewish critics of the Israeli occupation, has achieved some notable victories in recent weeks.

Last month, PGGM, the largest Dutch pension fund, announced it was divesting from five Israeli banks because of their involvement in financing Israeli settlements. That was followed by an announcement that Denmark's Danske Bank was blacklisting Israel's Bank Hapoalim over its settlement activity. Sweden's Nordea Bank has asked two other Israeli banks for more information about their activities in the settlements.

In the United States, settlement goods were in the news recently after actress Scarlett Johansson came under fire for representing SodaStream, an Israeli company that produces home soda machines at a factory in the West Bank.

And in Europe, the United Kingdom and the Netherlands already label goods made in the settlements, and the European Union (EU) has threatened repeatedly to take the labelling continent-wide. U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry warned last week that Israel could face even greater boycott pressure if peace talks with the Palestinians collapse.

But several CEOs of companies that operate factories in the settlements acknowledged that while boycotts could hurt sales, they don't yet represent a serious threat to business.

An award-winning wine from Psagot Winery

Yehuda Cohen, CEO of the plastics company Lipski, which has a factory in the northern West Bank Barkan industrial park, said sales dropped 17 per cent in 2010 when local Palestinians started boycotting his products. His company has since recovered, growing by 18 per cent last year.

Though only a fraction of Lipski's products are shipped abroad – 16 per cent of total sales are for export, of which a majority goes to Europe – Cohen acknowledges that the EU move to label settlement products is a real threat. Labelling settlement products, Cohen said, could hamper relations with retailers.

"I don't think we've come to the level of a boycott, but labelling is half a boycott," Cohen said. "The retailer will say, 'I don't want problems. Israel is not acting well.'"

A European boycott could have a much larger impact on SodaStream, which according to a 2012 Bloomberg News report, looks to Europe for most of its sales. The company's CEO, Daniel Birnbaum, told the Forward recently that having a factory in a settlement was a "pain in the ass."

The impact of a boycott, though hardly irrelevant, would be more limited for Psagot and Lipski, neither of which is as reliant on European business.

But neither Burg nor Cohen shares Birnbaum's sentiments about the virtues of operating a business in the West Bank. Nor does Rami Levy, the head of the budget supermarket chain Rami Levy Hashikma Market, which operates three locations in the West Bank.

For Burg, his vineyard's location is in part an ideological statement of opposition to a Palestinian state. Cohen said he supports Israeli-Palestinian peace talks and the goal of a two-state solution. Like other CEOs of companies with West Bank operations, he believes his company furthers the cause of peace by giving jobs to Palestinians.

"Not only does it not do damage, it provides an example of how to live together, how we can do business together," Levy said. "When you open businesses, you create more jobs. Just don't discriminate based on religion, race and nationality."

Levy, whose chain employs about 2,000 Palestinians, was part of a delegation of 100 Israeli businessmen to the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, last month aimed at encouraging a peace agreement. More than half the 90 employees of Lipski's West Bank factory are Palestinians. Burg employs four Palestinians out of 20 total employees.

Hilik Bar, who chairs the Knesset caucus for furthering relations between Israel and Europe, said Levy's argument won't convince Europeans in the absence of a peace agreement. Bar strongly opposes boycotts, but the Labor party lawmaker believes the government needs to pursue peace more aggressively.

"It's not just the two [Scandinavian] banks, it is spreading everywhere," said Bar, who also chairs the caucus for the promotion of a solution for the Israeli-Arab conflict. "Israel has an image as a state worthy to isolate. It's a whole world we're giving up on economically as long as we don't come to a two-state solution."

But Levy claims not to be worried. Europeans, he said, talk a good game when it comes to settlements, but ultimately they're focused on the bottom line.

"If we let them profit, in the end they'll invest," he said. "The Europeans know one thing: Israel treats them well."

Reform movement gets apology

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israeli lawmaker David Rotem offered a full apology for reportedly saying the Reform movement "is not Jewish."

At the start of a Knesset constitution, law and justice committee meeting on Sunday, Rotem again addressed the remarks, which raised the hackles of religious and other Jewish groups in Israel and the United States.

"I had no intention of hurting anyone or the Reform movement," Rotem said, reading from a prepared statement, according to Ha'aretz. "There were those who tried to twist my words into meaning that I did not believe that Reform Jews are Jewish. For me, any Reform Jew born to a Jewish mother is a Jew like any other.

"My intention was that I have deep differences with the Reform movement about practical matters related to Judaism. At the same time, considering that we are all Jews and members of the same religion, we need to solve these differences in discussions and conversations around the table. I apologize to anyone who may have been hurt."

On Feb. 6, Rotem said his remarks made the previous day had been "misinterpreted" by the media.

The director of the Reform movement in Israel, Rabbi Gilad Kariv, thanked Rotem for his Sunday apology, according to the Jerusalem Post.

"The only way to conduct the significant arguments between Jewish denominations and the different sectors of Israeli society is through mutual respect and by seeking the common ground," Rabbi Kariv said.

Following Rotem's apology, MK Uri Maklev of the United Torah Judaism party said Rotem was forced to apologize and accused the Reform movement of bribing Israeli lawmakers, according to Ha'aretz.

There's an app for visiting the Holocaust museum

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL - History is converging with modern technology to raise awareness of the Holocaust, especially among younger people.

The Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (MHMC) has launched a mobile application for the iPad and Android tablets that's designed to enhance visitors' experience of the museum.

The app can also be used as preparation for a visit or as a virtual tour.

Three different options are available to download at no cost.

A general tour is numerically co-ordinated to each display in the exhibition, which commemorates and educates about the Holocaust largely through the personal stories of survivors, most of whom live or lived in Montreal.

Visitors can follow sequentially or zero in on areas that interest them. A map of the museum's two levels is provided, and the user can keep a record of what he or she has seen already by typing in the numerical code.

They can consult the app to get more information on each item displayed, more background and photos on an individual, including video of them speaking. Audio commentary is provided throughout.

Many of the items are personal belongings donated by survivors or their families, about which there is much more to tell than can be included in the texts accompanying them, said MHMC museum and collection co-ordinator Julie Guinard.

"The supplemental information makes these people more three-dimensional," she said. "Objects alone may not mean much, but when a connection is made to a real person they do."

The app is also a practical tool. The pages of a book on view can be flipped through, for instance, by swiping the tablet screen.

Similarly, the secrets contained in "The Heart from Auschwitz," which has proven to be one of the most effective teaching tools especially among younger children, are revealed through the app.

Donated by survivor Fania Fainer, this little cloth-covered folded cardboard heart was a birthday gift to her by fellow female inmates at the death camp. Made from scraps, the heart's folds conceal the wishes the young women wrote.

With the app, the heart can be unfolded and the inscriptions within translated from the Polish, Russian and other languages with a touch to the tablet screen.

The museum can only display a fraction of the MHMC's holdings, which has now reached more than 10,000 items, including documents. Most of that is conserved in off-site, climate-controlled storage, Guinard said.

The other tour options offered are more specialized, focusing on the experience of children and teens, Jewish as well as Roma, Polish and German, and the theme of "Deconstructing Genocide."

The latter is a guide to understanding how the Holocaust and other mass atrocities can take place.

"They do not happen overnight," said Guinard. "It is a process that begins with propaganda, with the use of prejudice and the polarizing of minorities."

The MHMC's goal is to sensitize the public to all forms of hate and racism, and the peril of remaining indifferent in the face of them.

The children and teens tour resonates with the thousands of students that pass through the museum's doors annually, Guinard said. They get a sense of what life was like for Jews their age before and during the war, as well as after immigrating to Canada.

Sometimes their only shred of normalcy was hanging on to a beloved possession, such as the doll that's on exhibit in the museum. The app tells a lot more about the toy than the text that accompanies its display.

There are full English and French versions of the app, whose development was funded by the Quebec Ministry of Culture and Communications.

For those who don't have their own device, the MHMC loans mini iPads free of charge to visitors.

"So far, it has been really well received," said Guinard of the app, which was officially launched in the fall.

"Teachers at a conference we held got really into it. Some said they would use it in the classroom for preparing students before they came here."

The MHMC thought the app would appeal mostly to 18-35-year-olds, but Guinard said all ages seem to have taken to the technology with ease.

The museum continues to expand its use of computer technology. Interactive, touch-screen maps and timelines are slated to be added over the next few weeks.

"Instead of a static map, visitors will be able to scroll through the chronology, from the time a ghetto was established to its liquidation, for example, or to follow the progress and retreat of the Allies and Nazis across Europe."

Guinard stressed that even though the museum's holdings are already vast, it continues to encourage survivors or their descendants to donate objects and record their testimonies.

Even the most mundane items may help transmit to people today the history of the Holocaust as experienced by real people living in their city, she said.

Although they may not be displayed – in reality or the virtual world – they are made available to researchers and sometimes loaned to other museums in Canada, Guinard added.

A visitor uses a mobile app during a visit to the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre.

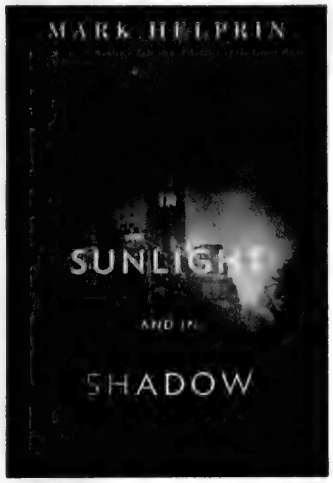
Helprin crafts a tale full of magical moments

In Sunlight and in Shadow
Mark Helprin
Houghton Mifflin Harcourt

Reviewed by Mordechai Ben-Dat



There are certain moments, certain rare instances in our lives – we all know – that open a portal into a vulnerable realm of a more deeply-felt human experience. If we could, we would suspend time's flow to remain in place, held invisibly by an emotional anchor, to the magic of the moment.

Many such magical moments await the reader of Mark Helprin's latest novel, just recently released in paperback. Once again, the award-winning writer has crafted a story of such compelling literary force that the heart is left tender and sore from constantly being touched, prodded, penetrated, wounded and uplifted.

In Sunlight and in Shadow is a grand narrative arc that sweeps majestically across time, place, emotion, intellect, villainy and heroism. The story is a ship that sails into the deep waters of the author's thoughts and reflections on the eternal, uncompromising values of human life that he so fiercely cherishes and so publicly champions: responsibility, self-sacrifice, courage, honesty, generosity, beauty and love. Readers familiar with Helprin's novels and short stories will know that he has dedicated his literary career to the restatement and reinforcement of these values.

In his latest novel, Helprin writes of Harry Copeland, who returns in 1946 to his home in New York City after having fought in an elite paratroop unit in Europe in World War II. He returns to run the family business founded by his father. His father died while Harry was in Europe; his mother had died before he left. But malevolent forces have injected themselves into his beloved city while Harry was overseas and are now intent on harming him and the business. Harry must devise a method of foiling them. He must do so to secure his family business, to affirm the sense of justice for which he fought in Europe and to protect the woman with whom he has fallen in love.

Catherine Hale is a singer of extraordinary, near metaphysical power. She is a remarkable individual of vast grace, independence, and strength of character. She happens also to be very beautiful. Harry is swept up like a sheet of paper in a gale wind by the overwhelming emotion he feels at the first sight of her. Few writers today can write the scene the way Helprin does. It appears very early in the story.

"She walked with her back so straight and her head held so high that it was as if she had studied for years to be a dancer… She was a flow of colour. Her hair trapped the sun and seemed to radiate light. It moved in the wind at the nape of her neck and where it had come loose, but was otherwise gloriously up in a way that suggested self-possession and formality and yet also exposed most informally the beauty of her shoulders. She wore a blouse with a low collar that even across the gap he could see was embroidered in pearl on white and the glow of the blouse came not only from its nearly transparent linen but from the woman herself…

"She carried nothing, not a newspaper or a purse, and the way she walked was so beautiful that an angry man berated Harry for stopping on the ramp where he was oblivious of everything on account of a woman who then vanished, and left him as if struck by a blow…He had long known that to see a woman like this across the floor in receptions or gatherings is as arresting as if a full moon were rising within the walls of the room, but this was more arresting yet…

"[He] remembered at last to breathe and to walk, and the breath came in two beats, one of astonishment and the other of love, although what right had he to love the brief sight of a woman in white who had crossed a crowded deck and disappeared in shadow?"

Over the course of the nearly 700 pages that follow, Helprin tells us the dramatically spellbinding story of Harry and Catherine. In doing so, he introduces a rich, colourful roster of other characters that fills out the wide, finely crafted parameters of the narrative.

There are times we almost ache with wonder at the sheer cutting truth of Helprin's writing. We read, re-read and then read yet again some of his insights and observations. His descriptive powers rise far above most writers. We are moved by Helprin's recurring, paramount aim – reiterated in all his works of fiction – to give heft and meaning to the dignity of the "ordinary" human beings who labour honestly and long for family and community, who dutifully remember those who have come before, and who courageously strive to be good and decent people.

Helprin's body of work is diverse. Fiction is not his only fare. He writes prodigiously on esthetics, military strategy, defence planning and politics, to name a few of his interests. His numerous scholarly appointments include senior fellow of the Claremont Institute for the Study of Statesmanship and Political Philosophy. He has also served in the British Merchant Navy, the Israeli infantry and the Israeli Air Force.

Helprin is uncategorizable as a writer. He describes himself as belonging "to no literary school, movement, tendency, or trend." His career is eloquent proof of that proposition.

In explaining the genesis of In Sunlight and in Shadow, Helprin said he wrote the book as "a love song for my family, and because I wanted to go back to what I remember first and best. To do so, it was necessary to set the scene in the hope that it would come alive." We can happily report that Helprin has fully realized this hope.

Indeed, it is we – the readers – who come alive: tingling, energized, amused, entertained, moved, informed, educated, saddened, gladdened, even exhausted by the insights and emotions that Helprin evokes. In effect, he urges us to try to live our lives intensely where soul finds purpose in the deepest chambers of our heart.

In Sunlight and in Shadow is one of the best novels I have ever read.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

A heartwarming Israeli love story

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Israeli actor Adi Bielski reprises her role in the one-woman play An Israeli Love Story for three nights this week at the Studio Theatre at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, presented by the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company.

Based on a true story, An Israeli Love Story is written and directed by Pnina Gary, the recipient of the 2006 Life Achievement Award from the Israeli Ministry of Education and Culture, for her 50-year career in the:

Bielski previously performed the play in Toronto and Ottawa three years ago.

"The story is about a young girl in the years 1942 to 1948," Bielski says. She meets a man who's a member of Palmach, the elite fighting force of the Haganah. Just before they plan on getting married, he is killed during an ambush by an Arab mob.

"The thousand people that were invited for the wedding came to a funeral, and the food that was prepared for the wedding was served at the funeral. Every word in the story is true, and the real young girl, is actually the director and writer, Pnina Gary. The guy she fell in love with was the son of Yitzhak Ben-Zvi, the second president of Israel."

Adi Bielski

Bielski says that until the end, which is heartbreaking, it is a very joyful story. It has a lot of humour and a lot of funny characters. It focuses on first love, and for older audience members, it brings back memories of the '40s, while for younger theatregoers, it's the love story that catches them.

After each of the Toronto performances, the audience will be treated to a video introducing them to Gary, the real heroine of the story.

Gary wrote the play 12 years ago and kept it hidden in a drawer until the war with Lebanon seven years ago.

She related to the stories that came out in the news and felt it was imperative to finally produce this play.

She scoured Israeli theatre schools and companies until she found Bielski. Gary saw herself in Bielski, and Bielski felt compelled to do this production. They started by working together in Gary's living room for over six months, with no budget. To date, she has performed the play more than 450 times since 2008.

Bielski, who served as an education officer in the Israeli army from 2004 to 2007, is a graduate of the Yoram Levenstein School of Dramatic Arts. She won an acting award in Israel for her role in this play.

An Israeli Love Story is presented as part of Spotlight on Israeli Culture, a two-month showcase and celebration of contemporary music, drama, dance, art, film, video and photography. It runs in English Feb.13 at 1 p.m. and 8 p.m., Feb. 15 at 8 pm., and in Hebrew on Feb. 16 at 2 p.m. Call 1-855-985-2787 or visit www.hgjewishtheatre.com or the box office for tickets.

Jazz choir project builds communities through music

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

On a chilly Thursday morning in January, close to 300 grade school students packed the warm cafeteria at Westview Centennial Secondary School in Toronto and cheered as a few dozen of their peers took the stage.

One by one, small groups of three or four students approached the microphone, as a small band played jazz music behind them.

"I was going outside and the temperature dropped today," one group sang into the microphone. The rest of the student congregation joined in, repeating that phrase. The lyrics were improvised, made up just moments before the kids stepped up to perform.

The We Are One Jazz Project is the brainchild of Howard Rees, a Jewish musician and educator from Toronto, founder of the oldest independent jazz school in Canada.

Launched in 2008, and now partnered with the Toronto District School Board, the program brings students from grades 3 to 5 from priority areas in the city together to sing jazz compositions written for them.

The kids learn the music of jazz pianist, composer and educator Barry Harris, plus improvisation, scatting and more. Professional musicians mentor this large-scale jazz choir leading up to a gala concert finale.

"What we're doing is a community building thing that happens to use music," Rees says. "It's about giving the kids a chance, giving them something to feel good about. Most of these kids don't have music in their schools anyway, so we're their music program."

Jazz has, historically, been a kind of music that brought about social change. Rees says he sees the project as a path for students who may be from low-income families and disadvantaged areas.

The program offers the kids the opportunity to express themselves through music. In December, a young boy came up on stage at a rehearsal to do some scatting (jazz singing in which improvised syllables are sung to a melody). After he performed, the entire back row started to clap. Rees says that one of the teachers told him later that the boy has been mute the whole year and nobody had heard him speak.

"If you create a safe environment where [children] feel comfortable to try things without fear of embarrassment, their creativity soars," says Adrian Goodman, a music teacher at Pauline Johnson Junior Public School, which was involved with We Are One last year.

Although the students are young, Rees and choir conductor Brian Katz do not treat them like kids. At a rehearsal, when Katz leads the students in Harris's songs, he abruptly stops the melody if he notices that the kids are off-key, off-melody or even off-volume.

Katz sometimes tests the kids, asking how many bars are in the intro. Most of the time, the students respond correctly.

"It's amazing how kids from Grade 3 can learn [jazz and] all those syncopated rhythms," Katz said "But, in fact, kids have such fast nervous systems. Kids totally get that. They live in that universe of really fast rhythms."

Rees says there is an "angel" who provides most of We Are One's operating budget and remains anonymous. Private and corporate sponsors fund the rest of the project.

The best part of the jazz project is that it offers these young minds something outside of their everyday experience that can have a positive influence on their lives, Rees says.

"The kids love it because it's fun, it's different and it opens their minds. You have to be disciplined, you have to concentrate. There is a lot of work involved. It helps you think about being a more creative person."

TEATRON JEWISH THEATRE PRESENTS ROM-COM "HANDLE WITH CARE"

It's been said to closely resemble one of those commercial comedies by playwrights like Neil Simon and Woody Allen that were so popular with the Jewish audiences that dominated Broadway during the 1960s.

Jason Odell Williams's romantic comedy Handle With Care opens in a nondescript motel room somewhere in Virginia with an Israeli woman screaming in Hebrew at a flustered courier who speaks only English. The woman is in a panic because her dead grandmother's body has apparently been lost in transit to the airport. But when the courier summons his Jewish buddy to help translate, the stage is soon set for romance.

Currently running off-Broadway, Handle With Care opens Feb. 20 in Toronto in a production by Teatron Toronto Jewish Theatre, directed by Ari Weisberg and starring Zack Amzallag, Tal Shulman, Gloria Valentine and Tal Rosenzweig. Toronto Centre for the Arts, Studio Theatre, 5040 Yonge St., Feb. 20 to March 2. www.teatrontheatre.com

Former MTV host balances entertainment and social action

Ilan Mester
Special to The CJN

Something as simple as a game can change your life. One Canadian redhead who has made a name for herself in the entertainment world is living proof of that.

When TV host Jessi Cruickshank was fresh out of university, she taught a program for kids with special needs – something she still does to this day. She was playing a game called Shark, which involves putting newspapers on the ground and pretending they're islands.

"I remember swimming around this newspaper 'island' and it said, 'MTV wants you,'" she tells The CJN. "And it was this advertisement for auditions, open auditions, that MTV was having for hosts. And I remember thinking, 'Oh, that would be fun.'"

Up until that point, pop culture wasn't really on her radar. The Vancouver native never imagined she'd be paid to talk about celebrities, let alone make a career out of it. In fact, Cruickshank had aspirations to go to Yale University for a master's degree.

But after countless auditions, she scored a job with MTV Canada. Her first piece of homework was to watch Laguna Beach, a reality show about spoiled high school kids. "I remember watching it and thinking, 'Oh God, this is horrible,'" she admits. "'This is detrimental to society. I'm a feminist, and I don't believe in this.'"

When the head of MTV asked her what she thought of the show, she told him exactly what was on her mind.

"And he said, 'Well, too bad 'cause you're going to be doing a show where you talk about it,'" she shares. "And I remember thinking, 'Excuse me?'"

Eventually, the quick-witted host ended up loving the series and the humour she was able to find in it. Cruickshank says her chemistry with Laguna Beach: The After Show co-host Dan Levy was instantaneous.

"I think that's what people liked. They just felt they were hanging out with us," she says. "And honestly, they were."

But she didn't realize its success right off the bat. In fact, she only discovered its popularity during the first series finale of the show, when they invited a live studio audience to participate.

"Suddenly we're told that there are police outside of the building because there are over 6,000 people lined up and blocking Yonge Street in Toronto, trying to get into the show," she says. "And I remember thinking, I didn't even know 6,000 people were watching this on television, let alone wanting to come to a live taping."

She adds: "I threw up in a garbage can backstage before I actually went out to do the show."

The After Show turned into a smash hit for MTV, airing internationally and using the same format for similar reality shows, The Hills and its spinoff, The City.

That gig opened many doors for her, including the opportunity to interview celebrities like Tom Cruise, Zac Efron, Rihanna, Bill Gates and many others.

One of her most memorable moments happened when she accidentally ripped her tight leather pants in front of singer Adam Lambert.

"I had to do the rest of the interview with a full giant rip on my crotch," she says.

That's where Cruickshank's background in comedy and her ability to poke fun at herself came in handy.

As a kid, she was the only female member in an all-male improv team. This wasn't just any group. It featured actor Seth Rogen and Comedy Central's Nathan Fielder.

"At one point, we started to get hired to perform at bar and bat mitzvahs," she says with a laugh.

The witty redhead was offered a position with CTV's entertainment news show eTalk as soon as she left MTV in 2010, becoming its Los Angeles correspondent. Aside from CTV, she can also be seen on The CW, where she co-hosts and is a writer for the game show O Sit!

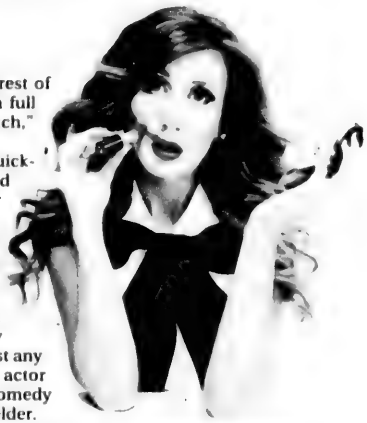
"I miss Canada so much, I really do," she says. "I miss my friends and my family, but I just miss living there. I just think it's a better place to live as a country and sort of our values – I miss it. But being here, I've been really lucky."

Cruickshank says volunteering keeps her grounded. As a Free the Children ambassador, the TV star has travelled around the world. In 2009 she lived in a Kenyan mud hut for 10 days, documenting her unique experience in an MTV special.

"I travel all across North America, speaking at high schools and colleges, talking about my experiences in a fun, light, yet I think, hopefully, inspirational way," she says.

Cruickshank, who counts her mother, CBC journalist Joyce Resin, as a mentor, says a lot of people ask her for advice.

She always tells aspiring entertainers to start wherever they can and work their butts off.



Jessi Cruickshank

"This is a whole new era," she adds. "If you want to be on TV you can film stuff on your iPhone and put it on the Internet. And I think you absolutely should."

So what's next for the MTV alum? She's looking forward to working on new projects with Free the Children.

"I'm really excited about what's next. It's kind of a cool time in my career," she pauses before adding. "I mean, I want to interview actor Leonardo DiCaprio. That's the most vain answer I can give you. I've never met him, but I think if I did, I would melt."

In typical Jessi Cruickshank fashion, she adds: "And I'm sure if I do, something terribly embarrassing will happen. It's not possible for me to have a classy, smooth interview. I'll say something stupid, that's just how I seem to roll."

A Taste of Jewish Camping

SUMMER CAMP can be a transformative experience for children. It's their first taste of independence wrapped up in a warm atmosphere filled with fun experiences, new skills, exciting activities and special friendships.

Make that camp experience at a Jewish Camp and it has an even deeper effect on them.

Not only do studies find that Jewish camping is significant to the development of Jewish identity in kids…they find that Jewish camp rivals any other form of Jewish identity investment!

PJ Library Toronto and the Silber Centre for Jewish camping, both initiatives of UJA Federation, are giving families the opportunity to get a 'taste of Jewish summer camp' at the 2nd Annual 'PJ Kids Go To Camp', Sunday February 16th from 3-5 pm at Prosserman JCC.

PJ Library books, sent monthly to the homes of some 3600 families in the GTA raising Jewish children between the ages of 6 months to 5 ½ years, like "I Love Camp", "No Baths at Camp" and "Sami's Sleepaway Summer" let children read about what summer camp is like, but there's really nothing like experiencing it for yourself.

Program Coordinator Elyse Tytel says "PJ Kids Go To Camp gives both children and parents the opportunity to test drive Jewish camp in a fun, interactive way. Activities include arts & crafts, cooking, dancing and photography. And while the kids are having fun, parents will have an opportunity to talk to camp staff. To top it all off….there will be a chance to win a free trial at the camp of your choice."

With 10 Jewish camps participating, there is something for everyone. The connection between Jewish camping and PJ Library is a strong one. PJ Library founder Harold Grinspoon has been a longtime supporter of making the camp experience a Jewish one.

"The camp experience will leave a lasting impression of the smiling faces of young children as they create lifelong friendships, experience new activities, and develop emotional and social skills," Mr. Grinspoon writes. "That they also develop a love for Judaism that stays with them into adulthood is almost beside the point, an added benefit, to the fun they have playing outdoors in the summer sun."

Last Spring, the Foundation for Jewish Camp released a study on the long-term impact of Jewish overnight camp. Just as has long been suspected, they found that the lazy days of summer spent at Jewish summer camp not only cement lifelong friendships, they strengthen Jewish identity.

The impact of Jewish camp is immediate—campers return home connected to a community and friends that will last them a lifetime. And it doesn't stop there. Children with pivotal Jewish camp experiences are more likely to become adults who value their Jewish heritage, support Jewish causes, and take on leadership roles in their communities. The Jewish overnight summer camp experience has proven to serve as a portal to Jewish identity.

Recognizing these facts, UJA Federation's Jewish Camp Incentive Program helps make Jewish camping more accessible. One Happy Camper awards a $1,000 incentive grant to first-time campers to attend Jewish overnight camp. www.ilovejewishcamp.ca.

PJ Kids Go To Camp takes place Sunday, February 16th at the Prosserman JCC, 4588 Bathurst Street from 3-5 pm. Registration is free at www.pjkidsgotocamp.eventbrite.ca

At the bus stop

Senior Side of Life
Michael Gordon

When visiting Israel and staying with my classmate from medical school who lives just north of Tel Aviv in Herzlia-Petuach, I usually take the number 90 bus, which stops in front of one of the local small hotels. As I sat down on the bench to wait, I asked the older man already sitting there if he had been waiting long and when the bus was expected to come. It comes every half hour.

"I'm not waiting for the bus. I just stopped here to give my back and legs a rest," he told me.

His accent was clearly eastern European, a common phenomenon in people of his generation. He continued without my prompting: "If I walk for more than 100 to 200 metres, my left leg goes weak and I have pain in my back. If I stop for five minutes, it improves, and I can walk some more. I am waiting to have surgery next week on my back to relieve it."

This was all told to me spontaneously in Hebrew. Mine is limited, but adequate for day to day conversation.

He asked me where I was from, as I speak Hebrew with a strong English accent. He acknowledged that he knew of Canada because he had a cousin in Thornhill – a common connection when people hear that I am from Toronto.

I enquired where he was going to have the surgery, and he said at Tel Hashomer, one of the larger centres in Tel Aviv, one that I knew from my years living in the country. When I revealed that I was a physician, he asked if I knew his doctor, and I told him I didn't.

He continued spontaneously to tell me much about his life and medical history, which characteristically included his survival as a child in eastern Europe, even though his father and other family members perished. Then he spoke about his arrival in Israel, the story of his schooling, his military service including the Six Day War, and the loss of his wife.

At the time of our conversation, he was living in a local retirement home, which he said suited him, as he had his needs met, his meals made, he could walk in the lovely neighbourhood, and there were lots of nice people he could speak to.

He indicated that the reason he had agreed to the surgery even though he knew it might not work and had some risks was that one of his great enjoyments was walking, and now that activity was terribly curtailed.

After a few more minutes, he wished me well, including wishes for my good health, and went on his way. I watched him walk about 300 metres, and then he sat down on another bench. Then my bus came and I lost his image.

Here was a 10-minute encounter with a stranger who revealed his history to me with the ease and comfort that someone else might feel in talking about the weather. In each of those minutes, I learned about the tragedies of his life and about his positive life philosophy. He complimented all the doctors who have looked after him for so many years and spoke of how we physicians had successfully extended life expectancy so that he could still enjoy his. He had an engaging smile and managed small moments of humour even as he spoke about his illnesses and his life losses.

When people ask me if I find geriatrics "depressing," I tell them it's quite the opposite – so many of the people I care for have wonderful stories. Whether as a physician or in any walk of life, it's our shared stories that connect us at the most human level. My encounter was a very human and typically Israeli prelude to my bus ride into Tel Aviv.

FOOD DRIVE: December's ice storm and power outage left many local food shelves and Out of the Cold programs in need of restocking, so the Tikkun Olam Committee at Leo Baeck Day School's south campus initiated a food drive to help. Making your own cheese

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

David Rotsztain didn't set out to become an artisan cheese-maker. His career took a circuitous route, beginning in civil engineering and veering into community farming and cheese-making when he was a graduate student at the University of British Columbia (UBC).

The Toronto native gave a cheese-making demonstration at the third annual Shoresh Food Conference, held recently at the Miles Nadal JCC and attended by 120 people.

Shoresh, a Jewish food movement rooted in Halachah, focuses on ecological, ethical, health and other issues related to contemporary food production.

About 30 people crammed into the JCC's third-floor kitchen for Rotsztain's demonstration. It was the most delicious workshop of the conference, which also included sessions on Jewish farming, microbiology and fermentation, raising animals for consumption and issues pertaining to genetically modified foods (please see related article in this issue on page 10).

Rotsztain, 33, said he was eager to participate in the Shoresh conference, because he supports Shoresh's mission of promoting natural and ecologically sound food production. "The workshops I teach mesh with their mandate and values."

He said he has been interested in food production since he was five years old. "I have tended a garden most of my life."

When he was an engineering student at McGill University in Montreal, he had a plot in a community garden. He also volunteered in the gardens of a local youth-run intergenerational meals-on-wheels program.

Rotsztain maintained this connection to food production while doing his master's in environmental engineering in 2005, working on a community farm on the UBC campus.

His academic work in sewage treatment systems led him to research bacterial cultures and fermentation. He started by acquiring what he called "fermentation pets" such as sourdough starter, and later, kefir grains for milk fermentation.

"While I was playing around with the kefir, I stumbled across the idea of making cheese, and I started making all sorts of cheese. My roommates thought I was nuts, but they loved the cheese."

He said he felt conflicted, because there was a "philosophical rift" between his academic research, which supported industrial agriculture, and his growing connection to "sustainable food initiatives."

He ended up dropping out of school and completing two organic farming apprenticeships while continuing to hone his cheese-making skills.

During his first apprenticeship, he made his first batch of raw milk goat cheese or chevre, which he continues to produce today. He's a member of a co-operative farm on Mayne Island, B.C., and for the last seven years, he's been lecturing and giving workshops on cheese-making.

Rotsztain stressed that he can't sell his cheese commercially, because it's made from raw goat's milk. "I make the cheese for friends. I bring it to potlucks. As a result, I get invited to a lot of dinner parties."

He likes working with raw milk, because it's healthier than pasteurized milk and closer to traditional cheese-making practices, he said.

In fact, he pointed out that this method of fermenting raw milk is very much akin to the traditional way kosher cheese was made in the shtetls of eastern Europe.

"In the movie Fiddler on the Roof, you see Tevye in his dairy and you can see the cheese hanging in cheese cloths. There was no rennet used, because the cheese would not have been kosher. They just let the milk sour on its own.

David Rotsztain demonstrates how to make cheese.

"You can do that with raw milk, but pasteurized milk would go rancid. The raw milk thickens up to become clabber, or curdled milk. The clabber was hung in a cheese shmatte and it turned into a soft, fresh cheese."

Rotsztain's career may have had an unusual trajectory, but his artisan cheese-making has brought him to his roots.

"I am making cheese the same way as my great-grandmother, Miriam Finkelstein. She made cheese out of raw milk and sold it at her store in the village of Skawina, Poland."

For more information on cheese-making, visit Rotsztain's website at: www.thewayofcheese.com

DREAM CHEESE

32 oz. (908 g container) plain 3% yogurt
1 tsp. kosher salt (non iodized)
Cheese cloth: a piece of muslin or a clean rag, freshly washed or wet. (A grocery store-bought cheese cloth does not work well, because the weave is too loose.)

Drape the wet cloth over a large bowl and pour the yogurt into the centre of the cloth. It's important for the cloth to be wet so that the cheese does not stick to it. The yogurt should have only 2 ingredients– milk and bacterial culture. (Yogurts with pectin, cornstarch, fruit and/or sugar cannot be turned into cheese.) Full-fat yogurt is better than skim, because low fat cheese tends to sticks to the roof of the mouth like peanut butter.

Pull together the four corners of the cloth around the yogurt. Give the cloth a twist and secure it with a knot. Hold the cloth with yogurt over the bowl as the liquid drips. The liquid or whey has nutrients and can be consumed or used for cooking.

Stick a wooden spoon through the knot and suspend it over a large pot to catch the whey, which will continue to drip. Do not squeeze out the liquid. Keep the yogurt and pot at room temperature for 24 hours. By that time, the cheese will have dripped dry. In this state, the cheese is called lebneh.

To salt, open the cloth and mix the salt roughly into the cheese. Adding salt increases the cheese's longevity and enhances the flavour.

After salting, close the cloth and hang the cheese over the pot for another 4 hours. The salt will draw out additional moisture from the cheese. Refrigerate cheese. It can last up to 3 weeks. The finished cheese has 12 per cent butterfat.

Variations:

Chevre

Use goat's milk yogurt instead of cow's milk yogurt to make a chevre cheese

Peaceful Dream Cheese

Follow instructions for Dream Cheese, but after salting, allow the cheese to drip for an additional 24 hours. The cheese should be firm and cleave like chocolate.

Make sure the cheese is very dry before rolling it into 1 inch balls.

Dredge balls in dry spices or herbs like za'atar, a spice mixture used by Sephardi Jews.

Fill a jar halfway with olive oil. Gently drop cheese balls into the jar. Make sure the balls are covered with oil. Refrigerate for 1 month before eating so the cheese can absorb the flavour of the spices. It can last for up to 8 months. A 32 oz. (900 g) container of yogurt yields 8 cheese balls.

NB: If the cheese balls float in the oil, they are too moist and may be fermenting. Do not eat them.

Jacobovici defends his reputation in court

Michael Posner
Special to The CJN

Canadian Israeli filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici is no stranger to controversy.

Best known as the host of the TV series The Naked Archaeologist, Jacobovici has directed more than a dozen provocative feature documentaries, including Deadly Currents, Hollywoodism and The Exodus Decoded. Almost all of them have broken new ground or challenged conventional wisdom.

The resulting backlash has inured the three-time Emmy Award-winner to criticism. But he wasn't prepared for the campaign of vilification mounted by retired Israeli curator Joe Zias after the release of Jacobovici's most recent docs – The Lost Tomb of Jesus (2007) and The Jesus Discovery/The Resurrection Tomb Mystery (2012).

A Michigan-born anthropologist who made aliyah in the 1960s, Zias, 72, says Jacobovici is exploiting archeology for financial gain or, in his words, "pimping the Bible." Specifically, in a series of web postings and emails to Jacobovici's employers, bloggers and journalists, he accused the filmmaker of "planting archeology," forgery and inventing a Holocaust story. Although many scholars have derided the films as manipulative and sensationalized, only Zias has actually accused him of fraud.

"I don't mind being criticized," Jacobovici, 60, said in a recent interview. "People should be free to say what they want. But there's a difference between free speech and libel. And when you make these kinds of allegations, you cross the line."

Last year, the filmmaker formally filed a libel suit against Zias in an Israeli court, seeking $1 million in damages. However, given the glacial pace of Israel's judicial system, it will likely be months before there is a verdict.

Jacobovici is not the first to feel Zias's wrath. In the past decade or so, he has charged half a dozen senior archeologists, scientists and religious scholars with deceiving the public. For instance, he accused the late Bar-Ilan University historian Hanan Eshel of forging a Dead Sea Scroll fragment, and lobbied for his dismissal. Aren Maeir, former chair of the university's department of archeology, confirms that Zias urged him to fire Eshel, the author of more than 200 published papers.

Zias declined to be interviewed about Jacobovici's libel case, but in various online postings, he has attempted to portray himself as the potential victim of censorship.

PCs Retain Thornhill

TORONTO — Tory Gila Martow was elected the MPP for Thornhill in a byelection last week. Tory Peter Shurman, won the riding in the last two provincial votes. In 2011, he defeated Liberal hopeful Bernie Farber, a former CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress. Shurman's resignation last year over an expenses flap paved the way for Martow, a 52-year-old optometrist, to be the Conservative candidate in the Feb. 13 vote. She won with 49 per cent of the vote over Liberal Sandra Yeung Racco, the City of Vaughan's councillor for Ward 4, who had about 40 per cent.

Porter, El Al Sign Deal

TORONTO — El Al and Toronto's Porter Airlines have signed an inter-airline deal giving travellers more options for trips between Canada and Israel. Both airlines have operations at Newark International Airport, which will serve as a connecting point between Ben-Gurion Airport in Israel and Billy Bishop Toronto City Airport. The deal will let travellers connect from Billy Bishop to other Canadian destinations, as well as to check bags through to their final destination in Canada, the airlines said last week. Porter offers up to 13 round-trip daily flights to Newark from Toronto. El Al also offers weekly flights between Toronto and Tel Aviv.

ADL Head To Retire

NEW YORK — Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League and one of the longest-serving and highest-profile American Jewish leaders, will be retiring from his post on July 20, 2015, the ADL said Feb. 10. A lawyer by training, Foxman, 73, a child survivor of the Holocaust, started at the ADL in 1965 and became its national director in 1987.

Comedy Pioneer Hosted Iconic '50s Show

Sid Caesar in 1961

NEW YORK — Sid Caesar, regarded as the founding father of American Jewish comedy and live original sketch comedy, died Feb. 12 at his home in Beverly Hills, Calif., at 91 after reportedly being in failing health for a year.

He is best known for his Saturday night television variety show Your Show of Shows, which he hosted in the 1950s, and he launched the careers of Jewish comics such as Mel Brooks, Carl Reiner, Larry Gelbart, Neil Simon and Woody Allen.

Known for his comic timing, improvisational skills and ability to mimic foreign languages, Caesar received the Alan King Award in American Jewish Humor in 2000 from the National Foundation for Jewish Culture.

When JTA asked him at the time if being Jewish had something to do with his comedic talent, he bristled, saying, "You can be Jewish and be bad" at comedy.

Born in Yonkers, N.Y., the third child of Jewish immigrants from Poland and Russia, Caesar launched his comedy career in 1942 while performing as a saxophonist.

He suffered a two-decade addiction to alcohol and pills that ended in the late 1970s, according to Reuters.

WWII Pension Change

BERLIN — Germany plans to give thousands of Jews who worked in ghettos during World War II better pensions, the newsweekly Der Spiegel reported. The deputy labour minister presented the plan to amend the pensions law to an Israeli delegation last month. Germany started paying the pensions from 1997, and those who applied later could only claim four years of back payments. An amendment will change that and be worth more than $20,000 each to some 13,000 former ghetto workers living in Israel. An announcement is expected when Chancellor Angela Merkel visits Israel later this month.

Montreal town hall on charter draws a crowd

CJN Staff

MONTREAL — More than 500 people attended a "town hall" meeting on Bill 60, Quebec's proposed charter of values, organized by Federation CJA and its advocacy agency, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA).

The organizations have taken a clear stance against Bill 60, arguing that the bill violates fundamental rights and freedoms by excluding minority communities from fully participating in public life.

They submitted a joint brief to the National Assembly in December and are awaiting an opportunity to present it at the public hearings being held by a parliamentary commission.

CIJA board member Jason Caron emphasized the Jewish community's long history in and contribution to Quebec for over 250 years.

"We have a legitimate expectation that the continuity of our institutions, the value of our historic and religious heritage, and our acquired rights will be recognized and respected," he said.

Caron suggested that the minority Parti Québécois government is tampering with fundamental rights for political expediency, and that the charter is solely about "wedge politics" and the government's "short-sighted attempt to win a parliamentary majority."

The Feb. 10 meeting at the Gelber Conference Centre featured a panel discussion among journalists David Johnston, a Gazette senior editor responsible for the editorial and opinion pages; Lise Ravary, a columnist and blogger for the Journal de Montréal; and CJAD radio host Tommy Schnurmacher.

The discussion was moderated by lawyer Marc Gold, a past president of Federation CJA.

During the question period, the audience asked about specific concerns they had about the bill

Recognizing Israel as Jewish is part of ending conflict

"We are not going to recognize Israel as a Jewish state."
– Saeb Erekat, Voice of Palestine Radio, Feb. 10

Erekat, head of the Palestinian Authority's negotiations with Israel, was reportedly responding indirectly to Justice Minister Tzipi Livni, the head of Israel's peace negotiations team, who, according to Ynetnews, had hinted the previous day to a Knesset ministerial committee that they could be "in for a surprise" from the Palestinians on the recognition issue.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Erekat's blunt statement was no surprise at all. He was merely reiterating long-standing Palestinian policy.

Indeed, during a Feb. 2 interview with Jodi Rudoren of the New York Times, PA President Mahmoud Abbas stated it was "out of the question" that the Palestinians would recognize Israel as a Jewish state, adding that Jordan and Egypt were not asked to do so when they signed peace treaties with Israel.

Many Israeli Jews believe that genuine peace can only be achieved through mutual recognition or acceptance: a Palestinian state for the Palestinian people and a Jewish state for the Jewish People, with full democratic rights for the Israeli Arab minority. The Palestinians adamantly maintain, however, that acceptance of a Jewish state would require renunciation of their claim of a "right of return" of Palestinian refugees to Israel – something no Palestinian leader is willing to do.

When Abbas told Rudoren that something (unreasonable) is being asked of the Palestinians that was not asked of the Egyptians or Jordanians, he ignores the fact that neither Egypt nor Jordan (which had renounced its claim to the West Bank in 1988) was demanding that Israel absorb potentially millions of refugees. Indeed, the issue of a "right of return," which is relevant only in the case of the Palestinians, impinges uniquely on Israel's Jewish character and threatens it.

This impingement might help explain the results of the latest "Peace Index" released Feb. 4 by the Israel Democracy Institute and Tel Aviv University: "As part of a framework agreement with the Palestinians, 77 per cent of Israeli Jews believe it is important that the Palestinians recognize Israel as the state of the Jewish People, while 21 per cent believe it is not important. By political affiliation, 77 per cent of [those on] the right believe recognition is important, [compared to] 84 per cent of the centre and 63 per cent of the left."

A dissenting voice from the centre-left is the esteemed Shlomo Avineri, professor of political science at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. In a Feb. 3 Ha'aretz article ("Mahmoud Abbas holds the key to peace"), Avineri argued that, mainly for technical reasons of "political or diplomatic recognition," he does not support "Jewish" statehood being part of an Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement.

Nonetheless, he writes: "The Palestinian leadership must be aware of the deep skepticism in Israel over its genuine readiness to end the conflict, especially in light of the fact that in the Palestinian discourse, the Jews are not considered a nation but a religious community only. When Abbas says, at a conference in Ramallah, that the Palestinian leadership cannot relinquish the right of return for Palestinian refugees because it is 'an individual decision,' it only intensifies Israeli skepticism."

Still, Avineri believes that this skepticism can be addressed by Abbas speaking directly to "the people of Israel" persuading them that the Palestinians "are now willing to accept us" (without using the "J" term).

Avineri further believes that such "simple, unambiguous words" would "change the discourse in Israel," which is overcome with what we might call "the acceptance gap."

Others argue that Avineri's formulation would fail to address what he termed in his essay for The CJN in September 2011 as "the perception held by most Israelis that at the end of the day, the Palestinians are not yet reconciled to peace with Israel as the Jewish nation-state" – the sort of full acceptance required to counter the claim of a "right of return" to Israel.

As this column went to press, a Daily Telegraph story, drawing on a reported leak, appeared in the Feb. 12 National Post entitled "U.S. plan to recognize Israel as Jewish state; blow to Abbas."

We may soon find out.

Paul Michaels is director of research and senior media relations for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

OLYMPIC DREAMS

Skaters Dylan Moscovitch and Kirsten Moore-Towers placed sixth in pairs free skating, fifth in the short program, and took home a silver in the team competition at the Winter Games in Sochi, Russia. The Toronto-born, Waterloo, Ont.-based Moscovitch, believed to be the only Jewish athlete on Team Canada, told the Waterloo Record his first Olympic experience was everything he dreamed it would be. The pairs team said they hope to compete in the 2018 Winter Olympics in Pyeongchang, South Korea.

Don't silence Neil Young

It's shaping up to be the best summer ever for concerts in Israel, despite the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement's strident efforts to establish a cultural boycott of the country.

The lineup of musical acts offers something for every taste. The Rolling Stones are poised to give their inaugural concert in Israel in June, 51 years to the month after the release of their first single. Pop mega-stars Katy Perry, Lady Gaga, Beyoncé, Miley Cyrus and Justin Timberlake have shows scheduled or are expected to announce dates in the near future.

Grunge and alternative fans will welcome Soundgarden and the Pixies (who cancelled a 2010 appearance in Tel Aviv in the wake of the Gaza flotilla incident, but now appear to have had a change of mind). A host of up-and-coming indie acts, including Passenger and Cults, are also on the schedule.

Canadian artists will be well represented, too. Justin Bieber has a Tel Aviv date slated for May (though given his recent antics, who knows whether he'll be in any condition to perform by then). And the legendary Neil Young comes to town July 17.

Of all these artists, Young is getting the most flak for his decision to perform in Israel. The group Canadians for Justice and Peace in the Middle East has called on Young to show his support for "the human rights of the Palestinian people" by cancelling his concert. Meanwhile, Independent Jewish Voices released a video online that juxtaposes graphic images from the Vietnam War with scenes from the Palestinian territories, all set to the Crosby, Stills, Nash and Young's 1970 protest anthem Ohio.

An open letter that accompanies the video asks: "Will Neil Young listen to the Palestinians, or will he play to the tune of Israel's Apache helicopters and Hellfire missiles?"

Given Young's long history of activism, and his recent cross-Canada "Honour the Treaties" tour in support of aboriginal land claims against oilsands operators, it's easy to see why these groups are so aggravated by his trip to Israel – they thought he was on their side. Indeed, former Pink Floyd frontman Roger Waters summed up the BDS movement's collective shock in a Feb. 1 open letter posted on Facebook: "Neil? I shall ponder all of this long and hard… you were always one of my heroes, I am confused," Waters wrote.

Pop stars like Cyrus and the Biebs tend to avoid political issues (unless you consider "twerking" a political issue), but Young has never been shy about voicing his opinion. More than likely, Young gave serious thought to the ramifications of playing in Tel Aviv and concluded that doing so fits in with – or at least doesn't contradict – his personal and political values. Whether or not he comes right out and says so, by performing in Israel, he is implicitly standing up for the Jewish state and against the likes of Waters and Independent Jewish Voices.

In When God Made Me (from his underappreciated 2005 album Prairie Wind), Young wonders: "Did he [God] give me the gift of voice so some could silence me?" The answer is an emphatic "no," even if that is precisely what Israel's enemies would prefer.

Hillel must draw the line on BDS

It is extremely disappointing to read that chapters of Hillel have been hijacked into "hearing Palestinian voices" and that other so-called "Jewish" organizations have the gall to expect that Hillel should discuss anti-Israel narratives ("Where's the line in campus debates about Israel?" The CJN, Feb. 6). If anyone wants to hear Palestinian voices, they are welcome to listen to any one of thousands of NGOs and media that blindly support Palestinians and quickly shut down all pro-Israel discourse.

At least boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) is a red line for Hillel, as it should be for many reasons, but the real answer to BDS and the European Union law boycotting businesses beyond the Green Line is that they are racist. If any pro-BDS organization will boycott all of the numerous occupiers around the world, such as Turkey for the occupation of Cyprus, China for Tibet, Iran for Baluchestan, then there is something to discuss. Until then, boycotting the Jewish state while ignoring the others is simply anti-Semitic.

The answer is simple: the line is drawn when "discussion and dialogue" are really code for activism aimed at first infiltrating and then undermining Hillel as a staunch supporter of Israel, part of a course of action that would ultimately destroy them both.

It doesn't require Tyler Levitan's master's degree in political economy to understand that the aim of boycotting Israel, divesting from it and sanctioning it, is to destroy its economy as well as break its spirit, bringing an end to the country.

Why should Hillel permit such traitorous people to penetrate and destroy it? Levitan already has two organizations – Independent Jewish Voices (IJV) and now his Young Jews for Social Justice. If he doesn't like Hillel, he doesn't have to join, but he won't be content unless he destroys it. Should Levitan feel the need for the acceptance he's not getting from Hillel, the United Church will likely welcome him with open arms.

It is odd that people such as Irshad Manjii, Hirsi Ali and Nonie Darwish support Israel's existence alongside Arabs and Palestinians, while people of Levitan's ilk and his organizations aid and abet those seeking its destruction.

Advice to Hillel – Levitan's spurious argument for an "open Hillel" is a Trojan horse. Shut your gates to Levitan and IJV and feel no need for apology.

SodaStream flows in Israel

Bernie Farber's article ("Let a thousand SodaStreams flow," The CJN, Feb. 13) provides an example of why Jewish people are in such a difficult situation. How is it that so many Jews, including the former CEO of the Canadian Jewish Congress, have bought into anti-Israel and anti-Jewish propaganda? The Jewish people have rights, and we have the land deed to prove it. The rights given to the Jewish people in recognition of our history in the Land of Israel have not expired (see Article 80 of the UN charter).

It is time for us to broadcast, loud and clear, that according to international law, Jews are allowed to settle anywhere west of the Jordan River. Jews lived continuously in Judea and Samaria for more than 3,000 years. Renaming this land "the West Bank" in order to disguise this history, and making it Judenfrei for 19 years (1948-1967) as a result of Arab slaughter and ethnic cleansing, did not turn this land into Arab land. Ma'aleh Adumim and the other Jewish communities in Judea and Samaria are not on "occupied land."

Gas stoves weather the storm

Richard Rabkin ("Halachic challenges of the ice storm," The CJN, Jan. 30) is obviously unfamiliar with gas stoves. There is no need for the mashgiach to relight the pilot light in the gas stove oven. It is a gas stove and the gas supply was not affected by power outage. Gas heat did not work because there was no electricity for the fans or water pumps. Gas stoves rely on neither!

A figure skating champion and a civic leader

Allan Levine

The past is rarely neat or ordered, despite the tendency of historians to present it that way. Doing so makes history more understandable and places issues in context, but it often also distorts what really took place. Generalizing is especially dangerous and no more so than when it comes to the subject of anti-Semitism in Canada or elsewhere –for, there are always exceptions.

There is no denying that from the earliest days of Jewish settlement in Canada to about the 1960s, the country was not always welcoming. Anti-Semitism in all of its various forms existed, particularly after 1880 with the large scale immigration of Jews from the Russian Empire and Eastern Europe.

Across the country, Jews could not find jobs as teachers, salesclerks or hospital interns. Gentile mothers invoked the figure of the Jewish peddler, the Canadian Jewish Times noted in 1913, as a "bogeyman" to hush their children. Regarded as unwanted outsiders, Jews confronted restrictions at social clubs and summer resorts and were routinely the victims of street violence.

Intellectuals and journalists such as Goldwin Smith in Toronto and Henri Bourassa, the founder of Le Devoir in Montreal, castigated Jews as slackers who only took, but never gave back to the societies they lived in.

The situation worsened in the '20s and '30s typified at one end of the political spectrum by the popularity of Adrian Arcand's fascist party in Quebec and at the other, by the more genteel anti-Semitism of Canadian prime minister William Lyon Mackenzie King, who allowed political expediency to trump his own humanitarianism and refused to allow German-Jewish refugees escaping Nazi Germany into the country.

Amidst all of this was Louis Rubenstein, a late 19th century pioneer figure skating champion from Montreal and an avid sports enthusiast. He was president of the Montreal YMHA, curled at the decidedly non-Jewish St. Andrews Curling Club and was a superb bowler and cyclist. He was also a key member of his family's thriving metal plating shop, and a Montreal city alderman from 1914 until his death in 1931.

Louis Rubenstein was also a superb bowler and cyclist

Rubenstein was born in Montreal in 1861. He was the ninth of 12 children of Max and Leah Rubenstein, who had immigrated to Quebec in the 1850s from Russian-controlled Poland. Three years after Louis's birth, the family established Rubenstein Brothers, a metal plating business, which Louis later joined. In 1929, according to the company's website, Louis, a bachelor and the last surviving partner, sold the business to Jack and Dave Becker. Their brother Lavy later joined them. They transformed it into a supplier of equipment and machinery to the garment industry and it endures to this day under the ownership of Lavy's son Hillel and his three partners.

By the time Rubenstein was in his 20s, the family was clearly assimilated, unlike the thousands of the seemingly backward Jews from the Russian Empire who descended on the city. Being Jewish does not appear to have been much of an obstacle, if at all, in Louis's pursuit of sports. At a time, when Jews could not join athletic or golf clubs in Canada, Louis, with his distinguished moustache and bowler hat, became the country's best male figure skater, winning Canadian and U.S. championships from 1878 to 1891.

In 1890, he travelled to St. Petersburg to compete in an (unofficial) international skating championship which he won despite the poor ice conditions. He might not have experienced anti-Semitism in Montreal, yet he certainly did in Czarist Russia. Having discovered that he was Jewish, the St. Petersburg police wanted to expel him from the competition and send him home. Only the intervention of the British ambassador permitted him to stay and participate. When the police, who had taken Rubenstein's one-page passport, returned it, they had substituted the words "British subject" with "L. Rubenstein, Jew."

In later years, as is noted in the entry on him in the Canadian Encyclopedia, Rubenstein served as the president of the International Skating Union of America from 1907 to 1909, president of the Canadian Wheelmen's Association for almost two decades, and president of the Montreal Amateur Athletic Association from 1913 to 1915.

In 1914, at the age of 43, he ran for Montreal City Council in the downtown St. Lawrence ward and won by acclamation and continued to win election after election easily for the next 16 years. An enlightened businessman, he had a reputation for being a friend of labour.

When he died in January 1931, politicians from all three levels of government attended his funeral – certainly a rarity for a Jewish community leader in those days – and Montreal mayor Camillien Houde, among others, eulogized him. The Montreal Star wrote an editorial extolling his virtues and mourning the fact that the city's working class had lost a true champion.

A water fountain memorial was erected in his honour six years later near the old YMHA, which according to filmmaker Iris Wagner in a 2004 interview in The CJN "is the only public monument in Montreal, and perhaps in Quebec, honouring a Jew." A decade ago, Wagner produced a short documentary about Rubenstein.

Across Canada, there were other Jews like Rubenstein, whose lives were not necessarily exclusively defined by being Jewish. This is not to suggest that in the years before and after the Second World War, Canadian Jews did not experience prejudice and discrimination—since they surely did—only that history is rarely black and white, but more often a shade of gray.

We must master history, not serve it

Jean M. Gerber
in Vancouver

Recently two friends of mine passed away – well, one friend, whom I will call V, and one Ariel Sharon, whom I met only once, but what an encounter! When I came across the following quotation, I thought of them.

"History is useless. There's too much of it." So said Rex Stout's portly detective, Nero Wolfe.

History, Part 1: In 1974 my husband and I were spending a year's sabbatical in Israel. In the aftermath of the Yom Kippur debacle, Israel went all out to show the few professors who were actually on sabbatical there a really interesting time. We went from the Suez Canal to the Golan Heights on tours that were meant to showcase the country and its resilience (as well as its acquired territories).

One day, we met with Israeli military brass and the main speaker was Ariel Sharon. A more persuasive and personable man we had yet to meet. He was delighted to share with the crowd his hope for our future, based on his understanding of the past.

"Come live in Israel," he urged. In fact, come live in the Palestinian territories, which we are opening up. "What about the people there?" the skeptics asked. They can move across the Jordan River. His vision? A whole new Israel up to the Jordan filled with North American olim and empty of Palestinians. This would fulfil the historical dream of a restored Israel and assure its security.

To say we were not ready to take him up is to understate the case. We shook our heads – it wasn't for us, any of it.

Fast forward, and there was the same man who had envisioned a Greater Israel now sending the army to clear out the Sinai of settlers and hand Gaza back to the Palestinians, with all the dangers that entailed. Was this the same guy? A saintly twin? Indeed, in his last years he wasn't the same guy. Maybe he began to realize that there is history – yes, yes, a Greater Israel restoration, blah, blah, blah – but maybe he had decided that was too much history. Time to move on? We'll never know how he would have continued had fate not intervened.

History, Part 2: Last week an old friend died, a survivor of the camps and of the loss of most of her family. She had married and come to Canada as a young bride. V (let's call her that) threw herself into community volunteering. Her personal history, and that of the six million, would not deter her from creating a new life and family.

V knew what to do with all that history. Once in Vancouver, she became part of the first Holocaust Education Symposium. Supported by Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, a volunteer committee of survivors and other educators began the annual symposium for public high schools in the Vancouver area (and today, under the aegis of the Holocaust Education Centre, reaching far beyond).

She would begin her talk by telling students "When I was your age, I went to Auschwitz." If teenagers came to the event without a knowledge of the Holocaust, or if they had been swayed by deniers beginning to show their ugly faces, they left with a vivid picture of what had happened not just to millions, but to the person standing in front of them.

Over the years, more survivors came forward to speak. Now as their numbers dwindle, we have their filmed stories. They're less powerful, perhaps, than one woman or man speaking face to face, but they're still authentic and true – a way to make this terrible history a path to a different future.

So is history useless because we have too much of it?

Israeli poet Yehuda Amichai hoped not: in Seven Laments for the Fallen in the War, he wrote as refrain, "Behind all this perhaps some great happiness is hiding." Behind each war a step forward? Maybe inescapable history, maybe a future.

Author Amos Oz thought so in his conversations with Sari Nusseibeh, president of Al-Quds University. Oz: "The past cannot be brought back alive." Nusseibeh: "The future is more important than the past." Each one lamented that their histories were weighing down any possibility of an end to conflict, as each side became entangled in a historical litany of wrongs and rights.

In sum, we need to be master of history, not the servant.

Why I'm optimistic about our future

Norma Baumel Joseph
in Montreal

I've been writing this column since 2003. I never imagined that I'd last this long or like the process so much. Intriguingly, I didn't know I was so confident about our community and our future. I also could not imagine people's reaction to the columns themselves.

People often ask me how I choose my topics or find the time. Typically, I have no idea how my words or thoughts are received. People don't necessarily comment or contact me. And that's fine. However, every now and then, a column seems to resonate with people, and I get feedback.

Personal columns often reverberate with readers. Early on, I wrote a column about women saying Kaddish. That struck a deep chord, and different women commented. They were interested in the struggle for women's ritual practice. In general, you're interested in my struggles when you hear your own experiences validated or exposed.

Then there are columns that come out of questions people ask or insights friends offer. One such column was my discussion of the kidnapped Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit and our poor powers of remembrance. After it appeared, The CJN dedicated serious time and space to the campaign for Gilad's release. I'm proud to have been part of that. I was, and still am, concerned about Israeli MIAs. How can we keep them present in our minds and in Israeli political discourse? Your interest sparks my consideration.

Aside from commenting on things political, I like to dialogue about our community and our religious practices. Last month's column about who is religious quickly received many reactions. Many thought it was worth sharing with others. I'm especially proud that a teacher I respect greatly used it in her Grade 5 class. I felt strongly about what I wrote – about our heritage and the religiosity of Jews in all walks of life. I often feel we lose sight of our great strength and disavow our own diversity. There is a self-confidence that we as a community are entitled to, a sense of robust survival that we should not yield or hide from.

Significantly, I'm not afraid to criticize our community, its leaders and its members. There are issues we have not addressed or about which our record is poor. As you know, I practically rant about the deplorable state of agunot, women who can't receive a Jewish divorce. I blame all of us: rabbis, lay leaders, professionals, marrying couples, husbands and the Jewish legal system itself.

Clearly, I write about things I'm passionate about. These topics emanate from my concerns for our existence as a Jewish community. Thus, I'm writing today to tell you that I'm proud of our communal presence and vibrancy. I see a strong and successful Jewish world today. Many write that we're in a time of crisis. I don't agree. Despite the recent Pew study of U.S. Jewry, or perhaps despite its distortion, I'm heartened by our vitality. Reading the study carefully supports my optimism and confidence.

Never before in history have we had such a strong Jewish community or domain. Clearly, it's different than in the past, but change doesn't necessarily mean decline! Today we live in a world where there is a free and democratic Jewish State of Israel. Yes there are problems, but the state has significantly restructured our purview. One grand transformation of our community is signalled by the fact that American Jews are the most educated community ever in history. While some will fear this development as a sign of our secularization and the supposed attendant distancing from our ethnic or religious identity, that is not evident.

Significantly, there are more Jews getting a Jewish education today than ever before. Astonishingly, women are included in that demographic! Moreover, people are talking about their distinctiveness as Jews and acting in ways that endorse and promote their identity. There are more Hebrew speakers than ever, Yiddish hasn't died, and there are Jewish studies departments in countless universities. Jewish social networks have increased. Likewise, our social institutions have multiplied and diversified.

We're not unified or uniform, but don't be afraid. Diversity establishes a richness and vigorous presence. New ways of being Jewish in this world are developing, and that's a sign of dynamism, not death.

Careful to stay away from education trends

Longtime Heschel educator new head of school

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

As of next September, Greg Beiles, the curriculum consultant at the Toronto Heschel School will take over as head of school, replacing Gail Baker, who is retiring after 13 years in the post.

The announcement, made late last month in a letter emailed to parents, detailed Beiles' experience with Heschel, having been employed there for the past 17 of its 18 years.

In an interview with The CJN, Baker said Beiles has "seen [Heschel] grow from the beginning days until now to maturation. He is a passionate Jewish educator and he is completely committed to the philosophy and the vision and mission of this school."

Greg Beiles

Equipped with an undergraduate degree in Jewish studies, a bachelor of education from the University of Toronto, as well as a master's of education from U of T's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, Beiles has evolved from a third grade teacher in 1997 to elementary division head in 2000, to the middle school director a year later, and finally in 2004, to the role of curriculum consultant.

Beiles is also a PhD candidate in U of T's department for the study of religion, and last year, he received an Emerging Scholar Award from the Network for Research in Jewish Education in New York.

Following the announcement last month, Beiles spoke about being chosen to take over for Baker, one of Heschel's co-founders, and what the future holds for the arts-based, non-denominational school, which boasts an integrated curriculum that combines Judaic and secular subjects with a strong focus on social justice.

"Having worked at Heschel for 17 of its 18 years, I have had the privilege of working with all of the founders. I've been a student of the school as much as I have been a teacher here. It only makes sense that someone who has grown up with the school, who knows its philosophy and institutional history intimately, would be able to lead it into its next stage of growth," Beiles said.

"The school has a very unique educational philosophy… The feeling, I think, is that it would be difficult for someone from the outside to get the school… I think they felt I had the most experience, teaching across all the disciplines, and I really know the curriculum really well. I know the teaching methodologies really well. I have a good sense of the philosophy and the vision of the school."

Beiles said he sees Heschel as a "renaissance Jewish school" that combines art, science and religion, but added that he's careful to stay away from education trends.

"This whole craze now about having computers everywhere in the classroom –that's a trend. Computers are a tool, like a pencil or an inkwell. Of course our students have access to computers. They're the tools of the day. But basing an educational philosophy on computers is like basing it on a pencil," he said.

"We have always been a research-based school. We draw much of our pedagogical direction from research done… at the Harvard [Graduate] School of Education. And of course, we're inspired by the teachings of Rabbi [Abraham Joshhua] Heschel, who emphasizes awe, wonder and the importance of self-discipline in his vision of education."

Rather than get caught up in trends, Beiles believes it's more worthwhile to focus on refining the school's fundamental principles.

"You know the expression, 'God is in the details?' We want to keep working on making the practices that we've adopted work as well as they possibly can."

Baker, who said that she loves the school "deeply" and expects to stay connected with it despite her retirement, said tuition and enrolment will likely remain the biggest challenges facing Beiles, and Jewish day schools in general.

"To help families work around that has been a big challenge for the school and for day schools in general. People are selecting to not even come through the doors and when you ask them, it's, 'No, I'd love to, but it's just too expensive.' They won't even start to entertain that possibility. So we're always looking for ways to accommodate families, and I think that will remain something that he's going to have to focus on," Baker said.

Apart from the affordability issue, Beiles said another challenge is attracting a diverse student body.

"You want to make sure your school is reasonably diverse and you're able to attract Jewish kids from different backgrounds. I mean, for Heschel, our whole philosophy is rooted in pluralism, which means we want kids from different Jewish backgrounds, streams of observance and that sort of thing, but also we'd like to have some socio-economic diversity," he said.

Although Heschel experienced a significant drop in enrolment a few years ago – Beiles guesses that it may have dropped to as low as 185 students, from a high of around 300 – the school has been enjoying a steady increase since then, with a current student body of about 235 and growing.

"Our retention levels are extremely high. I don't have the number at my fingertips, but they're in the high 90s, I think. In the last few years, we've had very few kids leave and enrolment is strong. Not just enrolment into the early years, but we're also picking up kids in the lower elementary as well. We might even gain next year, despite the loss of a big graduating class," he said.

Baker said she's also encouraged by the school's growing population and high retention rate. "He'll need to be actively involved in keeping that going as we go forward," she said.

LONGTIME BLOOD DONOR: Eric Lakien, 63, was recently honoured with cake and balloons by Canadian Blood Services for donating blood for the 200th time. The husband and father of three sons, Lakien has been donating blood since he was a 17-year-old student at McGill University. Lakien is seen here with his son Josh, who gave blood for the first time.

Conservative, Reform leaders meet

Rabbis hold dialogue on community's future

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

When Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich, spiritual leader of Beth Sholom Synagogue, and Holy Blossom Temple's Rabbi John Moscowitz came together last week to have a public conversation about the future of Jewish communities, Rabbi Flanzraich said this is a topic that should literally make us sweat.

Referring to the recent Pew Research Religion and Public Life Project, which stated that only 22 per cent of Jews described themselves as having religion, Rabbi Flanzraich asked how we can create a religious community where people find meaning in synagogue and understand its values.

"[At Beth Sholom, we're working hard] to recharge people. The liturgy is in a different and complex language, yet, despite this barrier, there is a paradox. It contains certain human truths, and we need to explain what they mean and make them meaningful."

While Orthodox Jews feel they have no choice about attending synagogue, Conservative and Reform Jews have choices, he said. "We have to work harder and better. I deeply believe that [television and movies] are not meaningful and do not resonate in the same way [as our liturgy]. We have to find the right ingredient to make it happen."

Rabbi Moscowitz responded, however, that he is doubtful this can happen. "We may have to radically change the landscape. It is very telling that all synagogues are organized the same way. The largest space is where the fewest people spend the least amount of time.

"I suggest building around that space, and promoting study as a meaningful activity. There is something about learning and studying that can touch any mind at any age. It might move people from studying to davening."

Rabbi Flanzraich said he feared, though, that if people turned from prayer to study, they might give up entirely.

"It is a great challenge to try and use the moments when people are gathered, and use their heads to find their hearts. We are wired to think things and not feel, but prayer helps us feel."

Rabbi Moscowitz said people definitely want to belong to a synagogue. "They feel yearning, curiosity and alienation, and they want to belong [to something]. Most Jews want the smell of tradition in their shul, and to be left alone outside. When they enter a synagogue, though, they want it to seem like synagogue."

Asked by Rabbi Flanzraich if membership would change if prayer services were cut down, Rabbi Moscowitz said that "people would be outraged. The synagogue to which they belong must [be their representative] to the outside world."

In the question period, a member of the audience asked about the challenge of intermarriage, and Rabbi Flanzraich said his synagogue is undergoing a change of attitude.

He said this coming spring, the synagogue is having an off-site open house for interfaith couples. "We want to create an environment for those who are uncomfortable speaking to a rabbi. We have to reach out to them and be more proactive. If we engage interfaith couples in conversation, we stand to gain more. In an open market of ideas, we can win."

On a positive note, Rabbi Flanzraich said that the Pew report stated that 92 per cent of Jews are proud of being Jewish. "[Those numbers] are significantly important."

A second evening is planned for March 12, to discuss "Can non-Orthodox Jews be religious?"

Jews urged to become organ donors

Saving a life is paramount, says prominent rabbi

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

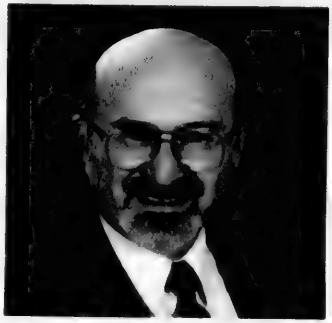
It is absurd to think that Jews should not become organ donors, said Rabbi Reuven Bulka, spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa.

Board chair of the Trillium Gift of Life Network and board member of Canadian Blood Services, Rabbi Bulka spoke last week at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation at an event sponsored by the synagogue and Beth Haminyan, with the assistance of Trillium Gift of Life.

Also speaking was Dr. Gary Levy, founder and former director of the multi-organ transplant program of the University Health Network. An organ donor and recipient also spoke.

The evening commemorated the first yahrtzeit of Allan Gould, a writer and former CJN columnist, whose family donated his organs after his sudden death from a brain aneurysm.

Rabbi Bulka said there are some excuses as to why people think they should not donate their organs. "The burial will not be instant, but not all burials are. Sometimes people wait for their families to come [to have the funeral]. Delaying a funeral because they are saving someone's life is a valid reason."



Rabbi Reuven Bulka

He said people also think that their loved one must be buried whole. "In an ideal world, they should be buried whole, but if the [part missing] is giving life to another, it is not an issue."

Saving a life is paramount, he said. "Knowing that, pushes away every other consideration, except taking a life. Saving other people's lives is a mitzvah, and nothing should stand in the way."

Organ and tissue donation does have challenges, he said, "but we will get over it. Hopefully rabbis will announce [from the pulpit that they've become donors]."

Levy said organ donation is recognized as one of the greatest medical achievements in this and the previous century. "Survival rates at one year are 95 per cent, and in five to 10 years, the survival rate is high."

In Toronto, he said, 650 organ and tissue transplants are done every year. "Despite our success, though, many people will die because of the shortage of organs. In our hospital there are too many patients waiting for the phone call [that tells them] there is an [organ] available. Last year, more than 150 people who were accepted for a transplant died, because there was no organ."

Levy said that organ donation rates in this region are extremely low. "We are obviously not getting the message out."

To help bridge the gap, he said, "we have established a cutting-edge, living donor program, the largest in [the country.]"

In Canada, he said, 40 to 50 per cent of transplants are based on living donors, [but] live donations carry risks. "It is a manifestation of our societal failure to come to grips with becoming organ donors."

He just returned from Israel, he said, where a law has been passed that says people who sign up to donate their organs, are given first priority if they need an organ themselves.

"We have to question why there is such a malaise to do what is so obviously right."

Gets kids involved with philanthopy

Leukemia fundraiser set for March 2

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

A fundraising committee of 25 kids from grades 3 to 8 are organizing the second annual Camp Imagine fundraiser for Imagine A Cure For Leukemia.

"This event was the brainchild of my daughter, Bayley, when she was 10 years old," Nara Abrams, president and founder of Imagine A Cure For Leukemia, said of Camp Imagine. It will be held March 2 this year at the Castlefield Event Theatre.

"For several years, Bayley has asked her friends to donate to the charity in lieu of birthday gifts. Last year, however, she said she wanted to do more and the Camp Imagine project was born."

"My Gigi [grandma] was diagnosed with leukemia before I was born," Bayley said. "We spent almost every day together until I was five years old. Then she got really sick and passed away. I miss her so much. I know she would be proud of me."

But Camp Imagine, an event for families, is more than just about raising money.

"We also want to encourage kids to get involved with philanthropy and to continue raising awareness of this illness. Most people are not aware that leukemia is the number 1 disease killer of children under 19," Abrams said.

Committee members are enthusiastic about working for the charity.

"It means a lot to me because it's a good cause. You need to be committed, because it takes a lot of effort," said Zev Friedman, 11.

Sabrina Sefton, also 11, said, "Helping organize this charity event is a great way to use what's in your heart and give back to kids who need help."

Benjamin Duke, 12, said, "I want other kids to know that anybody can make a difference and give back to their community. As we raise more money, we get closer to finding a cure for leukemia."

Benjamin's twin sister Jordana said, "Camp Imagine has taught me to never give up. When the world is a better place, anything is possible."

Participating camps include Bayview Glen, B'nai Brith of Ottawa, Northland B'nai Brith, Crestwood Valley, Manitou, Muskoka Woods, Robin Hood, Tamakwa, Tamarack, Timberlane, Wahanowin, Walden, White Pine, Winnebago, Elite Basketball, Richmond Hill Country Club, Stinger Ball, Westcoast Connection and Zodiac.

Each camp will have its own booth featuring a fun activity, and there will be snacks and food donated by several companies.

The event will feature a raffle, a silent auction, a dance that will be hosted by Sole Power Productions and the launch of the Camp Imagine theme song written and performed by Marlowe and The Mix and the Camp Imagine committee.

The Leukemia & Lymphoma Society of Canada says that this year 5,000 Canadians will be diagnosed with leukemia and 2,500 will die. Pediatric leukemia remains the most common pediatric cancer (in those age 19 and under). Leukemia accounts for 26 per cent of all childhood cancers and causes 28 per cent of deaths due to childhood cancer.

Imagine A Cure for Leukemia was founded on the premise that it's important to create awareness and raise money to benefit research.

"I feel fortunate that my mom was at our first two fundraising events. She knew she was our inspiration," Abrams said.

Rally planned in support of Lev Tahor

'They are people just like anyone else,' Chatham man says

CJN Staff

A man in Chatham, Ont. will be organizing a rally later this month in support of the controversial ultra-Orthodox Lev Tahor sect.

According to the Chatham Daily News, Chatham resident Dave Formosa, the founder of a local human rights Facebook group, is planning a Feb. 25 "community peace rally" near the Chatham-Kent Courthouse in support of Lev Tahor, which he feels is being unfairly maligned.

Formosa, who is not Jewish and is using Facebook to publicize the event, said the Feb. 25 date was chosen because that's the date Lev Tahor members will be at the courthouse to file their appeal of an Ontario court ruling earlier this month that upheld an earlier Quebec court order to send 13 children from the group back to Quebec to be placed in foster care.

He said he met with members of the sect to ask about how they would feel about a rally and said they approved.

"Basically, all we're trying to do right now is get people to understand that they [Lev Tahor] are people just like anyone else," Formosa told the paper.

The group's original lawyer had said the appeal of the Ontario court ruling would come last week, but as of last Friday at The CJN's deadline, the appeal had not been filed, Lev Tahor spokesperson Uriel Goldman said.

He also said the group has been instructed by its new attorney, St. Thomas, Ont., family lawyer Julie Lee, who will be handling the appeal, not to speak to the media any more about the group's case.

Goldman added that Lee will also be handling the group's dealings with Chatham-Kent Children's Services, including setting up meetings.

Child welfare authorities in Chatham-Kent had been closely monitoring Lev Tahor with near-daily visits since the group's arrival in the area. The last visit was late last month, and the group told The CJN it's no longer co-operating with them, because its contends the visits were intrusive, repetitive, and didn't turn up evidence of abuse or neglect.

Meanwhile, details of a Sureté du Québec investigation of the controversial Lev Tahor sect were expected to be released Feb. 14, much of it purportedly containing testimony by Adam Brudzewsky, who spent two years living with them.

Some of the children in Lev Tahor

Brudzewsky is being described by supporters as a whistleblower and by detractors as mentally unstable, the Toronto Star reported.

The Danish-born Brudzewsky, who is in his late 20s, reportedly testified at a Quebec youth protection hearing last November in Ste-Jerome that he had undergone an arranged marriage with a 15-year-old girl and personally witnessed mistreatment of Lev Tahor children, who were living in Ste-Agathe until last Nov. 17, when some 200 members of the group moved en masse to Chatham, Ont.

The court documents reportedly contain Brudzewsky's allegations of physical abuse, underage marriages and limited education of the children.

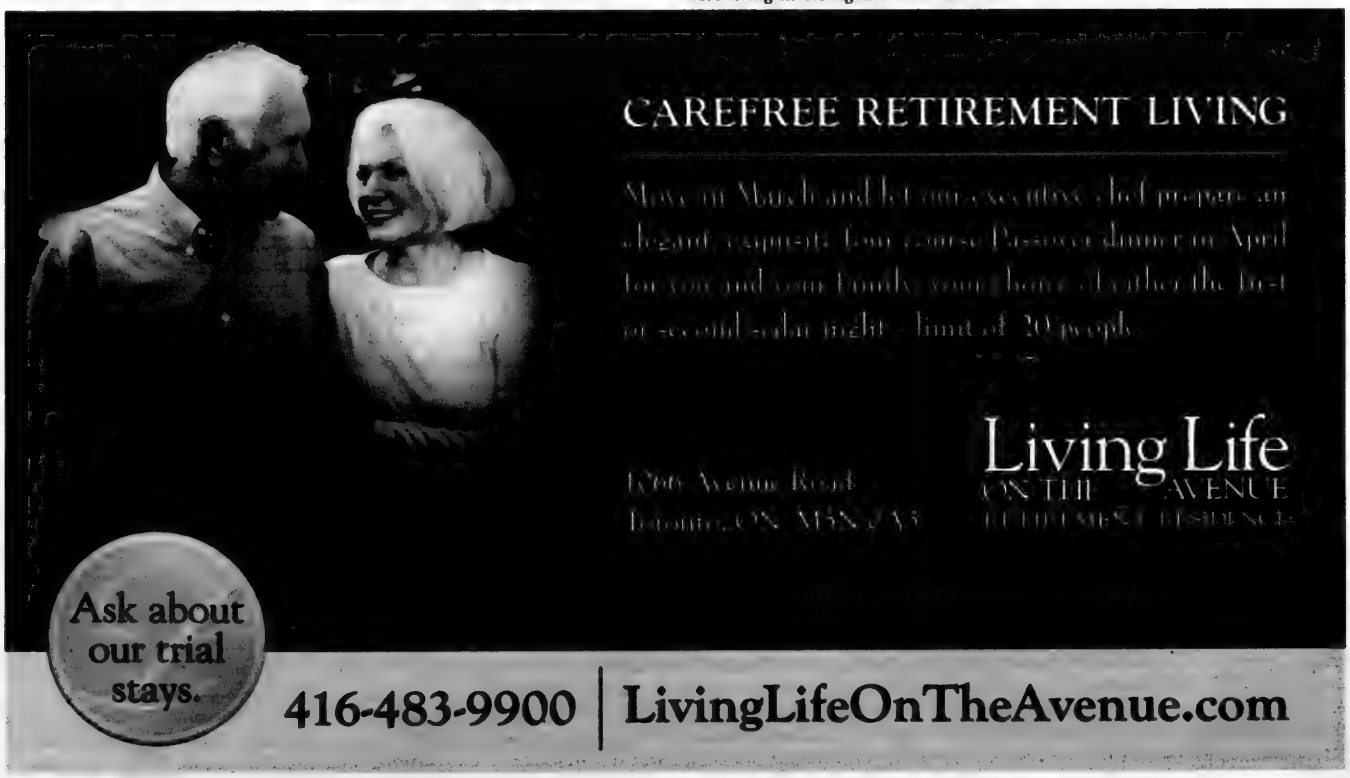
However, according to the Star story, Harold Boss, grandfather of Brudzewsky's wife, Leah, said Brudzewsky has shown signs of psychological problems – including a past suicide attempt – and that his testimony should be fully investigated before being accepted as true.

Brudzewsky and his wife left Lev Tahor in 2011 and went to his native Denmark. They later settled in Monroe, N.Y., to live with her family.

According to the Star, 10 prominent haredi rabbis met Jan. 7 in Montreal to discuss how the children would be housed with religiously observant, Yiddish-speaking foster families, but they also issued an edict forbidding their followers from helping Lev Tahor financially.

Montreal Satmar Grand Rabbi Dovid Meisels is quoted as describing Brudzewsky as "a real liar."

Brudzewsky told the Star he stands by his allegations against Lev Tahor, saying, "I challenge anyone to catch me in any lie whatsoever."



Mammography study questioned by doctor

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

A controversial 25-year follow-up study that concluded mammography is ineffective in lowering deaths for women at average risk of developing breast cancer is essentially useless for the general public, as well as for women at higher risk for the disease, such as Ashkenazi Jews who are more likely to have a genetic mutation that causes it, a leading expert says.

The Canadian National Breast Screening Study involved 89,835 women aged 40 to 59 who had physical breast exams every year for five years beginning in 1980. Half of those women also underwent an annual mammogram.

The study found that by 2005, almost equal numbers of women in each group were diagnosed with breast cancer – 3,250 of the group who used mammography and 3,133 who did not. Of those women, 1,005 had died of breast cancer – 500 from the mammogram arm and 505 from the control group.

Although breast cancer headlines tend to draw attention, there's nothing new in this study, said Dr. Ellen Warner, a medical oncologist at Sunnybrook's Odette Cancer Centre, and the fact the results were derived from tests done on "antiquated mammography equipment" poses a big problem.

Dr. Ellen Warner

"This equipment, even the best equipment [they used] is 30 to 35 years old," she said. "There is absolutely nothing to take away."

Around five to 10 per cent of breast cancer is due to an inherited genetic mutation. Some ethnic groups, including Ashkenazi Jews, are at higher risk of having that gene, making them more susceptible to breast cancer.

Since the study only looked at women with average risk, the conclusions cannot apply to anyone with a higher risk, such as people who carry that gene.

Warner said that only one in 40 Ashkenazi Jews have that mutation, so the majority are at average risk. The best way to figure out if you have that gene is to look at your family history, she said.

The study also said that too many mammograms have led to an over-diagnosis of cancer, since mammograms pick up small tumours that may never become harmful to the woman. That means women often undergo unnecessary surgery and therapy.

Indeed, the study said that between 20 and 25 per cent of breast cancers found using mammograms would never require treatment.

Although Warner agreed that this was the case, she said this doesn't mean healthy women of average risk shouldn't get mammograms.

"We have no idea which cancers… will invade and have the potential to kill a woman," she said.

She said that average-risk women should disregard this study and still get mammograms every two years after the age of 50.

And all women, especially those who know they are at higher risk of developing breast cancer, should make sure to exercise, limit alcohol intake and maintain a healthy weight to try to prevent breast cancer, she said, adding that it's especially important to know your family's history.

Limiting JGH cancer patients a rights issue: critics

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Quebec government directive to the Jewish General Hospital (JGH) to limit the number of off-island patients it treats has been criticized by a cancer advocacy organization, as well as by Jews living outside Montreal.

The Colorectal Cancer Association of Canada (CCAC) says the Montreal Health and Social Services Agency is wrong to order the JGH to turn away patients, especially those who seek care at its comprehensive cancer centre, the first of its kind in the province and renowned for its innovative treatment.

The agency has reiterated that people living off-island should seek care at hospitals in their areas. While the policy applies to all Montreal hospitals, the agency is especially pressuring the JGH, because it's concerned that it will exceed its budget by taking on too many patients.

"If patient numbers increase, the reasonable approach is for the funding to follow suit rather than jeopardize the standard of care offered to the patients," said CCAC president Barry Stein.

"By sending patients back to centres that may not be able to offer the same level of care as provided in a specialized cancer centre, such as the JGH Segal Cancer Centre, we may very well be affecting not only their quality of life, but their ability to either prolong their lives or find a cure."

Stein, a lawyer and colorectal cancer survivor, believes people have a fundamental right to receive health care from the physician of their choice. "This is a matter of government touching on individual freedoms and, in this case, for cancer patients, it is their fundamental right to life."

The JGH has become "a centre of choice" for colorectal cancer patients, he said, because certain treatments it provides are not available elsewhere in the province.

Debate on charter

In introducing the panel, federation president Susan Laxer said: "It is important to note that we are not alone in this fight. On the contrary, thought leaders from across Quebec civil society, including many from sovereigntist circles, have expressed strong opposition to some or all aspects of the charter…

"These include the Quebec Bar Association, the Quebec Human Rights Commission, teachers' trade unions, the Quebec Association of Health and Social Services Institutions and all major universities."

Rémi Bourget, president of Quebec Inclusif, a coalition of charter opponents from diverse religious, racial, and political backgrounds, made remarks as well.

The audience was encouraged to sign the group's "Manifesto for an Inclusive Quebec" and to visit its website for further information on their efforts (www.quebecinclusif.org).

Raising our kids to be knowledgeable Jews

Raquel Kaplan Goldberg

The conversation about Jewish day school and its affordability is becoming deafening these days, and I'm glad.

I am glad because parents are struggling to pay, and school boards and administrators need to take that struggle seriously. I am glad because the demand for new models is producing innovative ideas that can enhance Jewish education in general. But most of all, I am glad because the conversation is prompting us, especially those of us with day school-age children, to seriously examine the question of what we consider essential to Judaism and whether we think it's important to play a role in the development of Judaism.

In his Feb. 6 editorial about the costs and benefits of a day school education, CJN editor Yoni Goldstein wrote that he is "fairly confident [he] can, with a little help from family and friends, bring up a good Jewish daughter without day school."

Assuming "a good Jewish daughter" is a woman with a rich spiritual consciousness, a connection to Jewish rituals and an ethical sensitivity consistent with Jewish values like tzedakah (justice), kavod habriyot (respect for human dignity) and tikkun olam (repairing the world), I can only agree. I have always believed that one's ethical values are more strongly absorbed from family role models and home life than anyone or anywhere else, and most Jewish rituals occur in the home or synagogue in any case.

But is that the extent of the goal when we speak of raising Jewish children? Or is success measured in part by the degree to which our children are knowledgeable Jews?

It is hard to imagine children homeschooled in Judaism having even a passing familiarity with the Book of Kings, let alone tractates of the Talmud. I like to think Theodor Herzl would be mentioned, but Joseph Trumpeldor might be pushing it. Most parents simply do not have the time or pedagogical training to effectively transmit the extent of the material covered in a day school.

And knowledge of this material is important in Judaism.

For those who believe in the Divine nature of the Torah and Jewish law, there is religious value in studying the primary sources and understanding how Jewish law is developed. It is a means of knowing God and enhancing one's ritual observance.

For those who don't, there is still the strong notion that we are the People of the Book – that part of being Jewish is valuing the foundational Jewish texts for their own sake.

But beyond the intrinsic value of knowing and being able to study Jewish texts is the fact that doing this creates a platform from which to speak about Jewish matters. Simply put, this knowledge and skill set, along with an ability to contextualize one's views against the backdrop of Jewish history, are critical if one wishes to have a voice in the contemporary Jewish conversation.

Looking at the debates following New York's SAR High School's decision to let two female students wear their tfillin during female prayer services in the school, it is immediately clear that each side constructed its position out of textual building blocks in historical context. Whether pro or con, every argument I read referred to one or more of the Talmud, the Sefer Hachinuch, the Rambam and so on, and considered how the respective sources would apply in light of changed societal norms.

To the extent that this episode raised possibilities "in shaping the future of Judaism," as Goldstein put it, only those equipped with textual knowledge, textual skills and knowledge of Jewish history as it relates to the texts and practices in question, were able to meaningfully participate.

And this is by no means only true in Orthodox circles. While different denominations of Judaism take varied approaches to what can be done in the face of traditional sources, the sources are still the shared starting point.

So Goldstein's conclusion is right: day schools play a critical role in empowering our children to participate in the development of Judaism, but not only by exposing them to Jewish issues that arise in a school environment, or even by providing them with a training ground in the form of a mini-Jewish community of their own. Just as importantly, day schools provide our children with the textual and informational tools that will enable them to articulate and advocate coherent Jewish positions on whatever issues matter to them. They give our children the chance to have a say in what Judaism should look like.

Raquel Kaplan Goldberg is a day school graduate and the mother of two young children. She lives in Toronto.

Rabbi Jeffrey Saks

Exploring the midrashic style of S.Y. Agnon

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Jeffrey Saks is the founding director of the Academy for Torah Initiatives and Directions (ATID) and its WebYeshiva.org program, which he describes as "a fully-interactive online Jewish studies portal using a very sophisticated video conferencing system," that boasts about 7,500 registered students.

Rabbi Saks, who made aliyah from New Jersey 20 years ago after receiving his rabbinic ordination from Yeshiva University in New York, is also the series editor of the Toby Press' S.Y. Agnon Library and lectures regularly at the Agnon House in Jerusalem, a museum dedicated to the life and work of Agnon. A prolific writer, Agnon was the first and only Hebrew author to win the Nobel Prize in literature, in 1966.

S.Y. Agnon
[Wikimedia Commons]

Rabbi Saks, 45, was invited by Shaarei Shomayim Congregation's Rabbi Chaim Strauchler to be a scholar in residence on Feb. 21-22, and he spoke with The CJN by phone from Israel about his fascination with the literary legend and what makes Agnon relevant 44 years after his death.

How long have you been studying Agnon?

I grew up in a very Americanized home. All of my grandparents, most of my great-grandparents were born in America, but in high school, when I became interested in deepening my Jewish connection, one of my grandmothers bought me a copy of a collection of Agnon stories and translations. She was the most culturally engaged Jewish person in my family, and it wouldn't have been lost on her that a Hebrew writer had been awarded the Nobel Prize.

Part of what [Agnon] is doing is weaving together the whole world of traditional Jewish literature, Jewish learning from the Bible, through rabbinic writings, midrash, etc., and he's kind of weaving it together and distilling it down into modern literature. I thought that was really interesting, and it engaged me.

What was it specifically about his writing that fascinated you?

It was the attempt in the distilling the entire corpus of thousands of years of Jewish literature into a new modern storytelling, at a time when the modern Hebrew language was first finding itself. He had that added challenge of being a pioneer of writing in a language that was being created – modern Hebrew, that is – as it was coming out of his pen.

The question of the viability of tradition in the modern world and the tension between the world that was and the world that is, and also the tension between the Jewish world in Europe, specifically in eastern Europe and what was trying to be built here in the Land of Israel, these were things that were very interesting to me.

How does his work resonate with you?

I wrote a new preface to the book [A Simple Story]. I kind of described there what it was like reading this particular novel in my 20s, and then again in my 30s and then again in my 40s… I think part of what's so engaging about his writing, particularly to those of us who are used to reading midrashic text or rabbinic text, is that it does require that kind of intensive, repeated, interpretive inquiry.

In a certain sense, Agnon's writing almost reads in that same kind of midrashic style that requires a reading and re-reading, and re-analysis and re-interpretation…

[A Simple Story] is about a young man who falls in love… It's a star-crossed love. He's married off, as was the fashion in the beginning of the 20th century, to a girl who his parents think is a more suitable match. I read the book in my 20s, after a terrible adolescent heartbreak and I read it one way, and then you come back to it 10 years later and you see it differently, and then you come back to it 10 years later and you see it differently still. So that's part of the richness of this particular author.

Is there a newfound interest in the works of Agnon?

I think there is… In his lifetime he was the most important author in Israel, and he was even the most famous man of letters in Israel, and he certainly cast a giant shadow over all the authors that came afterwards and all of them talk about trying to write under the influence of Agnon – consciously or subconsciously – trying to resist it, or trying to walk in his footsteps. Authors like Amos Oz and A. B. Yehoshua and [Aharon] Appelfeld.

In the 1970s and even '80s, there was a kind of turn-away from the writing about the old world, and Israeli authors were trying to find a new voice and document the sabra experience, the Israeli experience of life here after the establishment of the state.

Agnon's stories… they're written in the '40s and '50s and '60s, but they're set much earlier on. There was a kind of lack of interest [in Agnon in the 1970s and '80s], and you can chart the interest in Agnon based upon what role he plays in the high school curriculum. There has been a kind of resurgence, partially because there has been a resurgence amongst the general Israeli population in Jewish learning, not just amongst the Orthodox.

It's been nearly 45 years since he passed away in 1970 – how does his work apply to modern-day Orthodoxy, and is it still relevant?

The question of how we relate to Israel, whether we live here or abroad, and our relationship to Hebrew, was something that was obviously very close to his heart. He was not a native Hebrew speaker. He grew up speaking Yiddish in his home in Europe. He made aliyah around the age of 20. He was born in Galicia in what is today Ukraine.

Obviously his connection to Hebrew and the interaction between Jewish learning and Jewish culture, these three things were central to his work, in addition to the larger theme I mentioned earlier about the viability of tradition in the modern world, the viability of faith in the modern world, the tensions between modernity and faith.

> 'Agnon's connection to Hebrew and the interaction between Jewish learning and Jewish culture were central to his work'

Those issues were very central to his work, and those are the things that the Jewish world needs to be engaged in, particularly the Jewish world that lives in Canada, America and Europe. The connection to Israel, our relationship to the Hebrew language, was once a defining mark of an engaged Jew, whether he was Orthodox or secular. An engaged Jew, certainly a Jew who identified as a Zionist living abroad had some kind of connection to the Hebrew language. That is no longer the case, unfortunately, for very many people. These are all things that I think still have relevance.

Rabbi Jeffrey Saks

He was also something of a paradox himself. He spent a period of time in his life where he abandoned traditional observance. He grew up in a completely traditional Orthodox home… When he came on aliyah in 1908, he took off his yarmulke, which was not uncommon during what was called the Second Aliyah… he lived in Jaffa and he lived the life of a secular Jew.

He continued to write some of his most profoundly, deeply, religiously charged work in that period.

He spent a few years in Germany… and when he returned 12 years later [to Israel], the big, black yarmulke, which had come off in his youth, now mysteriously returned. He never gave an explicit explanation, but there are a few hints in his writings, and he lived the rest of his life as a fully observant Orthodox Jew…

He's someone who straddled different worlds. That is something that we don't encounter so much any more. We all tend to live in our own little box, and it's important to know that there were people like that and to whatever degree that comes through in the writings, it's important for us to encounter.

Rabbi Saks will be delivering a lecture about Agnon at York University on Feb. 24. For more information, email LWiseman@edu.yorku.ca.

Filmmaker accused of 'planting archeology'

"In the search for fame and fortune," he wrote in one posting, "powerful media and personal interests… have encroached upon what once was a honest profession… In an attempt to silence academic critics, a small but financially powerful group… has chosen to react via libel ligation [sic]…an attempt to silence public criticism and freedom of expression, in order to advance their own parochial interests."

Zias has been most exercised by Jacobovici's recent documentaries, which focus on two ancient tombs in Talpiot, just south of Jerusalem, both originally discovered in the early 1980s. These, the films boldly suggest, are the likely resting place of Jesus, his extended family and his earliest followers. The first tomb contained ossuaries (bone boxes) inscribed with a constellation of suggestive names. These included Yeshua bar Yehosef (Jesus, son of Joseph); Maria (Latin form of the Hebrew name Miriam); Yose (a diminutive of Joseph, the name of one of Jesus' brothers found in Mark 6:3); Yehuda bar Yeshua (Judah son of Jesus); and Mariamene e Mara (possibly Mary of Magdelene).

For orthodox Christians, the very idea of a Jesus family tomb is anathema. Jesus could not have had his bones bundled into a box because, according to church doctrine, he was resurrected and ascended to Heaven. Nor do most mainstream Christians accept what the films imply – that Jesus was ever married, to Mary Magdalene or anyone else, or that he fathered children.

Jacobovici believes the second tomb, so far examined only by a camera attached to a tubular probe – Orthodox activists refused the filmmakers permission to enter the cave physically – contains the first hard evidence of contemporaneous belief in Jesus by his original Jewish followers. The cave, he posits, may have been on the estate of Joseph of Arimathea who, according to the Gospels, was the affluent member of the Sanhedrin who claimed Jesus' body after the crucifixion.

By pure coincidence, the same family name – Aramati – appears on a mailbox in the building constructed over the ancient tomb in the early 1980s. Before the trial started, Zias claimed – in letters sent to Jacobovici's broadcaster National Geographic, his publisher Simon & Schuster, and others – that the filmmaker had pasted the Aramati name on the mailbox to draw the parallel with the biblical disciple of Jesus.

This act, apparently, is what he meant by "planting archeology." Jacobovici denied the allegation, noting that the Jerusalem phone book showed a family named Arimathea (in Hebrew Aramati) living at the address long before the documentary was shot. Since then, in court depositions, Zias has admitted that there is such a family living in the building.

In court on Feb. 9, Zias brought what he had billed as a star witness to testify – an American matron named Joanna Garrett. A friend of Jacobovici's longtime collaborator, Prof. James Tabor, tenured chair of the department of religion at the University of North Carolina (UNC), Garrett spent one day with the crew during the shoot.

Documentary filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici shows a life-size replica of one of the ossuaries found in a first-century burial cave located beneath an apartment building in 2012 in Jerusalem. The artifacts, believed to date from the first century, are the subject of his documentary The Resurrection Tomb. [Lior Mizrahi/Flash 90 photo]

Later, she swore an affidavit claiming that the filmmaker had doctored the mailbox nameplate so that the Hebrew name "Aramati" would read "Arimathea" in English. This claim became the remaining basis for Zias's allegation that Jacobovici had "planted archeology."

On the witness stand, however, Garrett quickly disavowed her affidavit. Admitting that she never saw a doctored nameplate, she claimed that Jacobovici had said he "intended" to doctor the nameplate. She then conceded she had no knowledge of filmmaking.

In his own depositions, Jacobovici said he used CGI without altering the original nameplate to help viewers understand that the modern Hebrew name Aramati is essentially the same as the ancient Biblical name Arimathea. The two men are next due in the Lod courtroom in early April, under the jurisdiction of Judge Jacob Sheinman.

Zias's depositions have also backed away from his forgery allegation. By forgery, it turns out, he means that the documentaries used CGI to enhance images carved on the ossuaries. If that constitutes forgery, then half the documentary world will have to plead guilty.

Not long after the first Jesus documentary aired, a leading group of 70 scholars assembled in Jerusalem to discuss the issue. As part of the proceedings, they gave a lifetime achievement award to honour the late archeologist Joseph Gat, who was a member of the team that excavated the first tomb in 1981. Accepting on his behalf, his widow disclosed that, while her husband had never publicly discussed the find, he was convinced they had found Jesus of Nazareth's family tomb. He never talked about it, she claimed, because he thought the news would unleash a wave of anti-Semitism. Gat was a child survivor of the Holocaust and feared a recurrence.

Zias, who worked for the Israel Antiquities Authority for 25 years, until retiring in 1999, had previously claimed that no serious archeologist supported Jacobovici's thesis. When the widow's remarks suggested otherwise, Zias contended that Jacobovici had orchestrated the entire scene to promote his cause – arranged for the award to be given and for her to appear, and had written the script she delivered, including the Holocaust reference.

Jacobovici categorically denies the charge. He is himself the son of Holocaust survivors. Born in Israel, he was raised there and in Montreal, and made his home in Toronto from 1980 to 2006, before making aliyah. He now lives with his wife and five children in Ra'anana.

"It's one thing to claim this and that. It's another to accuse a child of Holocaust survivors of inventing Holocaust stories and then argue that a sentence from a woman I met once in my life justifies this language," Jacobovici said.

As it turns out, support for Jacobovici's tomb thesis did not come only from Gat's posthumous musings. Although initial academic and religious response was overwhelmingly dismissive, the ground of opinion may be starting to shift.

Late last year, the official proceedings of the Jerusalem conference were published, edited by Princeton's James Charlesworth, one of the world's top New Testament thinkers. The results are surprising because, while the naysayers have dominated headlines and blog postings, 12 of the 28 contributors now concede at least the possibility that the tomb is indeed that of Jesus' family.

In addition to his charges against Jacobovici and Eshel, Zias has also accused Prof. Richard Freund, head of Judaic studies at the University of Hartford, and Canadian geologist Paul Bauman of planting archeology – specifically, of burying a metal casket in a graveyard at Qumran, the ancient Essene encampment on the West Bank.

"We had a film crew there, which tracked [the dig] from the moment we started our work," Freund said. "I cannot understand why these allegations were ever levelled." Freund has authored six books on archeology, two on Jewish ethics, more than 100 scholarly articles and appeared in 15 television documentaries.

Bauman, technical director of geophysics in the Calgary office of WorleyParsons, a multinational project management and consulting firm for the resource and energy sectors, said his company works on "gargantuan industrial projects… and top-secret defence sites of multiple nations. Why would I risk all my professional credibility by putting a metal box in a remote cemetery in the desert? I have never received financial compensation for any of the archeology work I've participated in outside of North America – [it is] done entirely out of philanthropic intent. I've worked with Dr. Freund on at least 15 projects over the last 15 years. The very idea of 'planting' a find is inconceivable."

Then there is Prof. James Tabor, one of the world's foremost scholars of early Christianity. Zias's campaign, Tabor says, included "scurrilous letters to my editors at Simon & Schuster, to my agent, to my provost, chancellor and dean, as well as the chair of anthropology, in which he charged that I was guilty of 'conduct bordering on the criminal'… and that I was interested in only in fame and fortune and was a shame to the profession…Nothing of substance in Joe's charges was upheld, and he was told so by the [university's] attorney. He became very strident and threatened to expose our university as not taking responsibility for corruption. He subsequently wrote to UNC officials over the entire state system, making the same charges. "

Others who have stood in Zias's line of fire include Rami Arav, professor of archeology at the University of Nebraska, and Magen Broshi, former curator of the Dead Sea Scrolls.

Asked for comment, Zias – in an email exchange – said only that "none of the above have [sic] any respect among colleagues. They are mocked by all." Later, he added, "Change no respect to little respect."

Zias also played a central role in spurring the Israel Antiquity Authority to charge collector Oded Golan with forgery in connection with the so-called James ossuary. The IAA spent almost a decade trying to prove that Golan forged the latter part of the box's inscription, "James, son of Joseph, brother of Jesus." Among the key witnesses for the prosecution, Zias claimed to have remembered seeing only the first part of the inscription in an Arab-owned Jerusalem antiquities shop.

But as Time magazine later reported, Zias's testimony fell apart on the witness stand when he confessed that "he could not actually read the Aramaic inscription and that his Hebrew wasn't good enough to read his own name 'Joseph' on the box." Golan was declared innocent last year, although the IAA continues to insist the inscription has been forged.

North Carolina's Tabor says he, too, considered suing Zias for libel. "There's a trail of evidence that is irrefutable, but I've chosen to try to counter him in other ways. But Joe has vowed to try to destroy Simcha and boasted that he has done him great damage. I am a tenured professor, whereas Simcha has his own company and its reputation, plus the livelihood of his associates, to consider."

Going for gold

Money Matters
Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Fifty billion dollars is a lot of money. It represents close to half the budget of the State of Israel for the current fiscal year. It also represents the amount the Russian government is spending to host the Winter Olympics.

In the case of Israel, the money is used for education, health care, research and development, arts and culture, welfare, defence and a host of other activities. In the case of the Olympics, the money is being spent on unfinished hotels, shared washrooms, banning political protest, dangerous ski slopes, killing dogs, displacing locals, enriching corrupt officials and President Vladimir Putin's legacy.

The pawns in all this are the athletes, most of whom are far removed from the politics of the Olympics and are focused on competing in the sports they love best.

These games will be the most expensive yet, a full $7 billion or so more than China spent to host the 2008 Olympics. Is anyone surprised that these countries – defenders of the governments of Iran and Syria and with millions of people living in primitive conditions – have so much spare money for sports extravaganzas?

While the Olympics may be at the top of the wasted money heap, many others are trying hard to compete. For what purpose is the City of Toronto spending $2.5 billon to host the Pan Am Games? Surely not to provide Torontonians with the services they need most.

Our society deserves a gold medal for its ability to separate the moral from the legal. Hundreds of millions celebrated what I can only describe as a secular yom tov on Super Bowl Sunday (what a lousy game!), observing the many "rituals" that accompany the game. This in a league that agreed to pay close to $1 billion to former players suffering from the effects of legalized assault. I lost interest in hockey years ago when enforcers became crucial to teams' success – ironically it's only Olympic hockey, with its ban on fighting and focus on skill, that piques my interest.

Of course "legalized corruption" is all around us. It takes great talent and effort to spend $45,000 to attend a funeral. But somehow the premier of Alberta managed to find such a fare – all so she could get home a few hours early. Too many business "leaders" collect huge bonuses for their ability to stay within the law, even as they prey on the naive.

These are not new problems, and I would even argue that society today, at least in the west, is much less corrupt than in pre-democratic times. There is, at least in theory, equality before the law, and no one is above the law. The economic success of the west, to a large degree, is a result of the ability to trust others to be honest.

Other than continuing to stress the importance of living a life where proper ethics is our highest value, I'm not sure what the proper response should be. But there is a lot that can be done with $50 billion. Just ask Warren Buffet, who has pledged to give away more than $50 billion to charity. His gold medal shines the brightest.

Beyond the H-word: other Purim foods

Jewish & Digital
Mark Mietklewicz

Name a traditional food associated with Purim. Good. Now name another. If you have trouble getting beyond the H-word, then you're in for a treat. There's nothing wrong with that prune, poppy or chocolate-filled delight. But isn't it time to give aranygaluska, fazuelos and ojos de Haman a chance?

Okay, let's start with something a bit more familiar: kreplach.

What's the connection between Purim and a Jewish dumpling? According to Chabad, "Hamantashen and kreplach, both with their fillings hidden inside, allude to the hidden nature of the Purim miracle." [http://bit.ly/pfood2] MyJewishLearning.com continues: "Kreplach are customarily eaten whenever a 'beating' takes place: before Yom Kippur when men have flogged themselves [rarely done in modern times], on Hoshanah Rabah when willow branches are beaten, and on Purim when Haman is beaten." [bit.ly/pfood3]

What is it with Jews' preoccupation with Haman's anatomy? We eat hamantashen better known in Israel as oznei Haman – or Haman's ears. Sephardi fazuelos share the same meaning as their Ashkenazi counterpart, but the similarity ends there. These are light strips of dough fried and sprinkled with confectioners' sugar. [bit.ly/pfood4] Done with his ears? Then dig into his eyes. Ojos de Haman (Haman's eyes) have pastry dough wrapped around hard-boiled eggs to create grotesque facsimiles of Purim's villain. The eyes/eggs are then gouged out at the festive meal. [bit.ly/pfood6]

Purim is unique among all the holidays in the Jewish calendar in that we enjoy that festive meal as the holiday is winding down. [bit.ly/pfood7] Rabbi Eliyahu Kitov explains that "the Purim feast is especially significant in that it elevates the soul as it provides pleasure to the body. It is thus stated in the Zohar that on Purim, one may accomplish through bodily pleasure, what he can accomplish on Yom Kippur through bodily affliction." [bit.ly/pfood8]

You may have your own traditional menu, but if you want to try something a bit different this Purim, go back to the source: The Jewish-food Purim Archives has recipes for Persian Lamb and Apricot Pilaf, Persian Meat Patties (Shami), Persian Poached Pears and Persian Poppy Seed Puffs. [bit.ly/pfood9] The large Iranian/Persian Recipes page looks appealing, but you will have to make appropriate substitutions since this isn't a kosher site. [bit.ly/pfood10]

No worries about that at Chabad.org with this gourmet menu: Pesce al Cartoccio with Spinach, Egg and Onion Salad, Cream of Chicken Soup, Pickled Tongue in Apricot Sauce, and Two-Tone Potato Roll. If that feels too onerous, there's a helpful link to "The Easy Menu." [bit.ly/pfood12]

How to top off the meal? Aranygaluska is a traditional Hungarian Dumpling Coffee Cake for Purim with "balls of a rich yeast dough dipped in oil and rolled in ground walnuts. It is then layered and baked in a tube pan." [bit.ly/pfood13]

On Purim, Eli Birnbaum likes to enjoy his homemade Israeli Orange Brandy, and he is good enough to share the recipe with us. Birnbaum offers a rationale for imbibing on Purim, in moderation of course. "There are no absolutes in this world other than God. Everything can be used for good and evil. So, too, we celebrate our salvation from Haman by showing that even intoxication can be used to elevate one's soul." [bit.ly/pfood16]

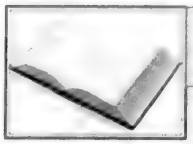
When does parenting end?

Rabbi Daniel Green



Rabbinic Reflections

As my oldest child attended her final high school open house, I found myself reflecting on how the years of impactful parenting are so fleeting.

As a rabbi, I often meet with newlyweds and young couples. I stress the irony of how we are challenged to raise our children precisely during our busiest years and how, if we pause to blink, we can miss the opportunity entirely.

Nearly all the parents I encounter recognize the importance of transmitting Jewish values. Notwithstanding, a predictable pattern emerges. We fail to properly gage the speed of time. Toddler and preschool years are readily dismissed as premature for lifestyle changes. At this young age, we often feel no pressing need to bring our children to synagogue or to enhance the Jewish character of our homes. Time seems endless.

As the primary years arrive, the sense of urgency is still not acute and life quickly takes over. We soon shift to a bar and bat mitzvah mindset and are unexpectedly confronted with teenage adolescence. Without warning, the opportunity for meaningful interaction quickly diminishes or dissipates entirely. Suddenly, we realize that the core years of active parenting can almost be counted on one hand.

While much of the blame for the increased trends in Jewish disengagement focus on the education we provide our children during their formative years, this is only half the battle. In order to turn the tide, we need to recognize that the responsibility of parenting never ends. It's a lifetime endeavour, and the only thing that changes are the tactics.

As our children become adults, we often resign ourselves to being bystanders who constantly swallow opinions. While this approach may be prudent and wise, in actuality, the primary mode of influencing others requires no words.

A paradigm for the transmission of our values is evident in the first Divine directive given to the Jewish nation. While still in Egypt, Moses and Aaron summon the people and impart the laws of the Pascal Lamb. Their instructions conclude with the words "vechen asu" – and they (Moses and Aaron) also engaged. Why the need to stress their compliance? Would anyone doubt the sincerity of Moses and Aaron?

Our tradition is imparting an essential lesson. Moses and Aaron recognized that words alone ring hollow. Only by modelling behaviour could they hope to inspire others. They understood that actions speak louder than words.

Responsible parenting requires the constant demonstration of our values, no matter what the age of our children. Wherever we are on the religious spectrum, this message is pivotal. We need to become the embodiment of our belief system in the most self-evident of ways.

If we want our grandchildren to be affiliated Jews, we need to attend shul consistently ourselves, even if this means altering behaviour patterns of a lifetime. If we want our children to become lifelong learners of Torah, we ourselves need to crack open the spine of a book and exhibit an excitement and passion for Jewish knowledge.

Whether you're the prime minister of Israel or a parent in Canada, we need to be aware that the eyes of our children still gaze in our direction. No matter what the age, we can never underestimate our power of influence. Parents are perpetual role models, and parenting is a lifelong responsibility.

Engaged? Get tested for genetic diseases

From the Bimah
Rabbi Catharine Clark

Did you get engaged over New Year's, or maybe on that Hallmark holiday in mid-February? If so, mazal tov! The next few months will be exciting as you select invitations, make a guest list, and register for gifts to fill the home you will make with your bashert.

I want to add one more item to your to-do list: if you're of Ashkenazi Jewish descent, get screened for Ashkenazi Jewish genetic diseases.

Tay-Sachs, a neurological disorder that is usually fatal by age four, is the most infamous of these disorders; but there are many more potentially devastating Jewish genetic diseases. Canavan disease, another neurological disorder characterized by seizures before death in childhood, and familial dysautonomia, symptoms of which may include poor growth, insensitivity to pain and a shortened lifespan, are just two examples.

These and other Ashkenazi Jewish genetic diseases appear in 25 per cent of cases where both parents are carriers for the gene. Carriers themselves are usually healthy individuals, which is why screening is so important. You'd never know of this risk to your children otherwise.

If screening reveals that both you and your partner are carriers for the same genetic disease, you have options for having the family the two of you have always dreamed of. You can adopt, or use donor egg or sperm screened for Jewish genetic diseases. You can become pregnant and test the fetus early in pregnancy to either abort or plan for a child with likely severe health complications. You can use IVF and implant only unaffected embryos.

Get screened even if your bashert is Sephardi or was not born Jewish. If your results show that you are a carrier for one or more of the diseases, your partner should be screened also. While it's more common for Ashkenazi Jews to be carriers of these genetic diseases, these genetic mutations do occur in the general population. Moreover, sometimes an individual whose family has identified otherwise for two or three generations in fact includes an Ashkenazi Jewish grandparent in the family tree, thereby increasing the risk of carrying one of these genetic mutations.

Get started now on the process of being screened. JScreen, the Victor Center for the Prevention of Jewish Genetic Diseases in Philadelphia, and the Jewish Genetic Disease Consortium in New York all recommend being screened for the full panel of 19 Ashkenazi Jewish genetic diseases for which a test is available. However, the current recommendation in Canada is to screen for at most 10 of these disorders.

Make an appointment with your doctor for a referral to a genetics counsellor to see what your options are. Or, to be screened for all 19 diseases, get in touch with Counsyl labs in the United States. They will work with you on the cost, and with your doctor to get a test order. More information on Ashkenazi Jewish genetic diseases and on why it's important to be screened for all 19 is available on the websites of JScreen, the Victor Center and the JGDC.

Again, mazal tov! Please take this step toward a life with your bashert filled with many more simchahs.

Jewish leaders laud Kerry peace bid

JTA

A letter to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu signed by 152 Jewish Americans, including top centrist leaders, praised the peace efforts of U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry.

"As American advocates for a strong, Jewish and democratic Israel, we have been heartened by Secretary of State John Kerry's extraordinary resolve to advance this process consistent with America's unwavering commitment to Israel's security," said the letter sent Feb.12 and initiated by the Israel Policy Forum.

"We believe Secretary Kerry's determined diplomatic effort offers an unprecedented opportunity to ensure Israel's security, to enhance its prosperity, and to avoid the existential threat to the Jewish state posed by bi-nationalism."

The letter comes in the wake of attacks on Kerry and his plan by top cabinet members in Netanyahu's government.

Netanyahu and his foreign minister, Avigdor Liberman, have praised Kerry and said personal attacks are inappropriate, but there remain gaps between what appear to be the outlines of a Kerry-drafted framework for a peace accord and Netanyahu's red lines, particularly regarding security measures in the West Bank.

Among the letter's signatories are Jewish leaders who are noted for their outspoken defence of Israel and at times of Netanyahu's government, among them Alan Dershowitz, the legal expert and author; Deborah Lipstadt, the Holocaust scholar; Mel Levine, a former Democratic congressman; Michael and Susie Gelman, major philanthropists and leaders in the Washington community; Rabbi Steve Gutow, the president of the Jewish Council for Public Affairs; Rabbi Rick Jacobs, the president of the Union for Reform Judaism; and major fundraisers for Democratic political campaigns, including Marvin Lender, Alan Solow and Alan Solomont.

Choosing a new president

JNS.org

With Israel's upcoming presidential vote poised to have the highest-ever number of candidates, a survey conducted for Israel Hayom by the New Wave Research Institute found that 72 per cent of Jewish Israelis favour holding a direct public vote for president over the current election system.

Just 20 per cent of respondents said they would prefer to retain the current system, in which members of Knesset elect the president.

Asked whether Israel should abolish the office of the president – a mostly ceremonial role – 63.8 per cent said no and 26.5 per cent said yes. Asked if they would like to see President Shimon Peres' term in office extended, 54 per cent said yes and 36 per cent said no.

Opinion

John Kerry's perilous path to failure

Jonathan S. Tobin
JTA

In the past few weeks, U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry has come under attack from prominent Israelis, as well as from American friends of the Jewish state, for some of the methods he has adopted in his determination to find a solution to the Middle East conflict.

Such criticism strikes the Obama administration, and many friends of Israel, as absurd. After all, what better favour could the United States do for Israel than to help it find the peace for which its people have hungered since the birth of their state?

But while Kerry's defenders are right to scorn those who seek to question his motives, the way the secretary has tried to strong-arm Israel has neither enhanced the chances for peace nor strengthened Israel's security. Though the quest for peace is, in principle, a noble endeavour, Kerry has set in motion a chain of events that is, in fact, strengthening those who seek to delegitimize and boycott Israel and may even increase the chances of a new round of Palestinian violence.

Kerry came into office last year determined to take up a challenge that his predecessor, Hillary Clinton, did her best to avoid. Clinton assessed the chances of peace between Israel and the Palestinians in the foreseeable future in the same manner as most foreign policy people: slim to none.

With the Palestinians hopelessly split between the Fatah-ruled West Bank and Hamas-run Gaza, there seemed little leeway for Palestinian Authority leader Mahmoud Abbas to sign an agreement that would end the conflict. Since the Palestinians had already turned down offers of statehood in almost all of the West Bank, Gaza and a share of Jerusalem, in 2000, 2001 and 2008, there seemed no reason for Israel to make further concessions only to be turned down a fourth time.

But Kerry was undaunted by these realities and set out to restart Israeli-Palestinian talks. Kerry has persuaded the two sides to negotiate and may get both Abbas and the government of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to agree to a framework to extend the talks that were slated to last only nine months.

Secretary of State's actions have served to delegitimize Israel

Kerry may even coax the Israelis to offer the Palestinians, as has been reported, a state in 90 per cent of the West Bank plus territorial swaps of land inside the Jewish state. If so, he may be as close to cutting the Gordian Knot of Middle East peace as any of the Americans who have preceded him. Even if he fails, this would seem to be a praiseworthy endeavour. But those who care about Israel shouldn't be cheering.

What Kerry has forgotten – or never knew in the first place – about the failures of his predecessors is that peace initiatives don't occur in a vacuum. The dynamic of every negotiation to broker an end to the conflict is that, in the eyes of international public opinion, progress is only measured in terms of Israeli concessions.

That means that rather than bolstering Israel's image and support for the country around the globe, every such effort – including Israel's aforementioned three generous offers of Palestinian statehood and the withdrawal from Gaza – only served to make Israel even more unpopular. In the 20 years since the signing of the Oslo accords, Israel has made concession after concession, and yet, international efforts to delegitimize Zionism and support the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement aimed at the Jewish state have only grown.

Israelis well understand that the current Palestinian leadership is not likely to sign any deal that will recognize the legitimacy of a Jewish state, no matter where its borders are drawn. Nor will the Palestinians renounce a "right of return" for the descendants of the 1948 refugees.

No matter what Kerry pressures Netanyahu into offering Abbas, the answer will probably be same one Ehud Barak and Ehud Olmert received: no. When that happens, expect the BDS campaign to redouble its efforts and European nations to blame Israel regardless of the fact that, once again, Palestinian obstinacy will have ended the negotiations and not a lack of Israeli flexibility or generosity.

Even worse, by seeking to frighten the Israelis into concessions by speaking, as he did last fall, about the chances of a third intifadah if the talks fail, and more recently, by predicting an upsurge in boycotts if no peace deal is achieved – while failing to acknowledge Palestinian intransigence as a possible cause of any failure – Kerry has not only tilted the diplomatic playing field against the Jewish state. He has also signalled that if he fails, it will be Israel's fault. While he may not have intended to encourage either violence or boycotts of Israel, that's exactly what he has done.

While Kerry entered this process thinking only of its success, an individual with less hubris and a clearer understanding of history would have known from the start that the costs of failure might be considerable. Israelis, who will pay the price for that failure, should be forgiven for thinking that Kerry deserves no thanks for his part in this sorry exercise in narcissism.

European parliament head 'hurt' by MK 'extremists' snub

JTA

Martin Schulz
[Wikimedia Commons]

European Parliament President Martin Schulz called the Israeli lawmakers who walked out during his Feb. 12 speech to the Knesset "extremists."

Schulz told the German newspaper Die Welt Feb.13 that he was "surprised and hurt by the harsh reaction because the speech I delivered was pro-Israel."

The Jewish Home party members who walked out in the middle of the address are "extremists," he said.

The lawmakers left after Schulz criticized Israel using incorrect facts, and party head Naftali Bennett has called on Schulz to apologize for his misstatements.

"Naturally, I cannot only say things that would be pleasant to everyone's ears. I must also present the controversial side of the things," Schulz told Die Welt, adding that he "presented to the Knesset the position of the European parliament."

Speaking in his native German, Schulz accused Israel of allowing its citizens to use four times the amount of water per person that is allocated to Palestinians, a figure that reportedly is highly inflated. He also criticized the Israeli blockade of Gaza.

Schulz also said there is no European economic boycott of Israel and that the European Union will always stand by Israel.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu later criticized Schulz for what he called "selective hearing."

"He said that he visited Ramallah and heard from Palestinian youths that an Israeli citizen uses four times as much water as a Palestinian," Netanyahu said of Schulz. "According to both the Palestinian water authority and our data, this number is not true and is significantly smaller.

"The parliament president said, in all honestly, 'I didn't check.' But that didn't prevent him from casting aspersions."

Danish Jews defend new kosher slaughter rules

JTA

The president of Denmark's Jewish community disputed a government minister's claims that new regulations would outlaw all kosher slaughter in the country.

"We find this an odd statement," Finn Schwarz told JTA Feb. 13 about statements made earlier by Agriculture Minister Dan Jorgensen to the Ritzau news agency.

Jorgensen was speaking about slaughter without prior stunning – a requirement for kosher certification of meat in Jewish Orthodox law and for halal certification of meat for observant Muslims.

"There has sometimes been demand for this type of slaughter, and I want to ensure that it's not going to happen in Denmark," Jorgensen said, referencing a regulation that was scheduled to go into effect on Feb. 17 against slaughter without prior stunning.

But Danish Jews already agreed in 1998 to the certification as kosher of meat from cattle that were stunned with non-penetrative captive bolt pistols, Schwarz said, adding that the decision was made in consultation with the British Chief Rabbi's office. The new regulation will not ban the slaughter of animals after stunning with non-penetrative captive bolts, he said.

Jewish Orthodox law and Muslim law require animals be intact and conscious when they are killed. Non-penetrative captive bolts were permitted because they do not wound the animal, which is slaughtered immediately after being knocked on the head.

Danish Jews took issue with the minister's statements this week, however, because he cited the need to observe animals' welfare, thus suggesting shchitah is cruel. He also cited the rareness of kosher slaughter, or shchitah, in Denmark as justification for a ban.

"The ministry has not banned other rarely practiced customs, so is there a focus on minorities?" Schwarz asked.

Israeli hotels anticipate a record-breaking Pesach season

Steve Walz
Special to The CJN

Israeli hotel executives are exuding an air of confidence ahead of the competitive Passover holiday vacation season after Israel's Ministry of Tourism (IMOT) reported that 2013 was the best year ever for incoming tourism.

More than 3.5 million foreign travellers visited the Jewish State for business, pleasure and religious pilgrimages.

According to IMOT, 3.54 million visitors came to Israel in 2013, 0.5 per cent more than the previous record year of 2012. Once again, the largest percentage of tourists came from the United States, with 623,000 visitors, and representing 18 per cent of all incoming tourism, one per cent more than 2012.

However, the 72,000 Canadians who visited Israel in 2013 represented a two per cent decrease over 2012. No explanation was offered by the IMOT for the downturn in Canadian tourism to Israel.

While 53 per cent of Israel's incoming tourism was derived from Christian pilgrimages, only 28 per cent of the total number of tourists came from the global Jewish community, including North America. That number would probably have been even lower without the influx of thousands of Jewish youngsters from around the world who partake in the Taglit-Birthright programs, where almost all of the costs (flights, hotels etc.) are defrayed by North American philanthropists and the Israeli government.

Jerusalem remained the most frequented city amongst tourists (75 per cent), with the Western Wall (68 per cent), Jewish Quarter (64 per cent), Church of the Holy Sepulcher (57 per cent) and the Via Dolorosa (55 per cent), which are located in the Holy City, being the most popular attractions for tourists and pilgrims alike. Tel Aviv-Jaffa was the second most visited city by tourists (64 per cent), who come to frolic along the beachfront promenade and revel in Jaffa's historical beauty. Despite the large influx of Christian tourists, Nazareth was only the fifth most visited city (35 per cent) amongst foreign visitors.

The record number of foreign tourists also provided an economic boon for the hotel industry as well as ancillary businesses, ranging from museums to shopping malls, coffee bars and even boutique wineries. IMOT revealed that 2013's tourists pumped nearly $12 billion dollars into the Israeli economy and provided work for 195,000 workers or six per cent of the Jewish State's total workforce.

"2013 was a record year for tourism and we are proud of that," said Dr. Uzi Landau, Israel's minister of tourism.

Dan Hotels experienced slight increase in demand

The Tourism Ministry will continue to invest in maintaining the numbers of tourists arriving in Israel by opening new markets and actively marketing the tourism product around the world.

"2013 was a good year, despite the fact that we were influenced by events around us [Gaza, Egyptian political instability, Syrian civil war,]" Rafi Baeri, vice-president of sales and marketing for the Dan Hotel chain told the Jewish Week.

"The Dan Hotels experienced a slight increase in demand, which helped us to finish 2013 with a small increase in occupancies. From the initial indication of the first quarter of 2014 and demand for individuals and groups for later months in 2014, we see a marked increase in demand and interest from all the main feeder markets and especially from North America.

"For North America, which is the largest source market for Dan Hotels, it looks as if our previous record which was set in 2010, will be surpassed in 2014. Demand for our hotels for Pesach is manifest to this expected growth.

"Comparing the number of reservations we had 75 days prior to Pesach 2013, we have 'on the books' about 20 per cent more reservations for Pesach 2014. At some hotels we are already sold out on specific days and room categories, and at others we have just a few last rooms to sell. As Pesach falls in mid-April this year, we expect to see a very pleasant spring in terms of both incoming business and the beautiful holiday weather."

Dan Tel Aviv Hotel Seder

A number of major hotels that regularly host guests from Canada during Pesach are still actively marketing their remaining rooms to potential clients. Amongst the hotels offering deals are:

• Dan Hotels (www.danhotels.com): At the luxurious Dan Tel Aviv, rates are valid from arrival date (April 13 or 14) for seven nights stay. The package includes seven night accommodation, two seder meals and five dinners. Categories include: standard double and single rooms, as well as a standard triple room (including a child up to 12 years old). There are still upgrades to deluxe (limited number of rooms available), as well as supplements for deluxe and executive sea view rooms. Rates can be received via travel agents or can be found on the hotel's website.

• Inbal Jerusalem Hotel (www.inbalhotel.com): The renowned hotel has been renovated from top to bottom, including the lobby and shopping arcade. The Inbal is the only luxury class hotel in Jerusalem offering bike rentals as well as guided bike tours. Day and nighttime tours leave from the hotel on a daily basis. Pesach package options at the hotel include:

Seven nights, April 14-21: double occupancy starting from $4,990; single $3,965; 3rd in room $1,865.

Kids ages 3-12 $828; 12-18 $1235; two kids 3-12 in 2nd room $4,105.

Packages include six holiday meals, including first night seder; four night package April 18-22 starting from $2,880; double, $2,280; single, $1,080, 3rd in room (ask for children's rates.) Package includes 4 holiday meals.

• David Citadel Hotel (www.thedavidcitadel.com): Amongst the most popular Pesach venues in Jerusalem, the hotel has added one of the most sought after gastronomic attractions, Chef Itzik Mizrachi Barak, who has worked at several luxury Israeli hotels and elite restaurants abroad. He will be prepping the sumptuous menus throughout the Pesach holiday. A special seven-night Pesach package, which includes six unique culinary experiences prepared by Chef Barak, starts from $5,950 per couple in a Superior Room.

• Sheraton Tel Aviv Hotel (www.sheratontelaviv.com): The beautiful beachfront facility is highlighting two Pesach promotions. Prices for guests staying up to five nights start from $410 for a single room and $430 for a double room in the deluxe category.

Supplement for a spacious club room is $70 per night. Guests enjoy free Wi-Fi in their rooms, as well as lobby, swimming pool and lounge. The new outdoor pool area also features a toddler's pool. The new restaurant/bar- DECK115- will be open for guests during Pesach to revel in Tel Aviv's exquisite sunsets and enjoy a delectable informal meal.

Fight for social justice starts at a young age

Rishona Altenberg works on letters for her fundraiser, a screening of the film Girl Rising.

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Rishona Altenberg is only 10 years old, but she is already working to spread a message about girls' right to education and human rights around the world.

She's planning her first social justice event in the form of a screening in Toronto of Girl Rising, a film directed by Academy Award-nominee Richard Robbins, at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre Feb. 20 – coinciding with World Day of Social Justice.

The film tells the story of nine girls who share with the viewer their struggles to overcome the obstacles in the way of their education and human rights.

"These issues are very important to me," Rishona said. "I think all children, including girls, deserve the right to an education."

The girls featured in the movie span the globe, coming from countries including Nepal, Haiti, Ethiopia and other places. It features narration by Hollywood legends like Meryl Streep, Cate Blanchett and Liam Neeson.

The money Rishona raises through ticket sales will be split between two organizations: Room to Read, which works with communities in Asia and Africa to develop literacy skills in primary school children and encourage secondary education for girls, and the Canadian Women's Foundation, which seeks to help women and girls in Canada move out of violence and poverty.

She chose the two groups because the first focuses on girls around the world while the second focuses on issues for women and girls within Canada, she said.

Although it may seem unusual for someone her age to be so active in social justice issues, she said her friends are also interested in working for this kind of change. She described how some of them baked macaroons with her, which they then sold in farmers' markets as a fundraiser.

She and a friend even attended a protest asking Toronto Mayor Rob Ford to step down because of his alcohol and drug use.

She did receive some help from her parents in setting up the movie screening, but she said she did a lot of the work herself, and she was surprised that it was easier than she had expected. Many people were willing to help her spread the message about girls' right to education, she found.

"It's definitely been not as hard as it could have been," she said.

Rishona said the screening could be a step toward her becoming even more of a social justice activist.

"From a very young age, I have been very passionate about justice and fairness, and I've wanted to do something to make a change," she said.

She said she hopes her passion will spread to the audience.

"I'm hoping it will make them want to make changes," she said. "I hope they will learn about these issues if they don't know about them already. I hope they will be inspired by it."

Girl Rising, which is rated PG, will be screened at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre on Feb. 20 at 7 p.m. Tickets are $15. For more information, visit algreentheatre.ca/events/47-girl-rising

Clubmom is a destination for mothers

Discount card program has grown to include more than 200 vendors

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Tal Srulovicz, left, and Stephanie Kleiman

Two Toronto mothers with seven young children between them, including a newborn, and a set of twins each, both left their corporate jobs to pursue an entrepreneurial business venture: clubmom.

Clubmom's flagship product, the clubmom shop-and-save card, began as a loyalty program in 2012, giving Toronto-area moms access to discounts at retailers and services across the GTA.

When done well, loyalty programs can keep customers coming back for repeat purchases, potentially turning a passerby customer into a loyal brand advocate.

"I always knew I wanted it to be more," founder Tal Srulovicz said of clubmom.

"The business started as an innovative fundraiser at my kids' school. The idea was to have a card that moms could use and that could be sold at different charities, schools, and hospitals, with participating schools receiving $10 back for every $30 card they sold. The name 'clubmom' captured all things 'mom' and would allow me to grow the business to more than just the card."

Discounts range from 10 to 30 per cent, and the card has grown to include more than 200 vendors, including Canada's Wonderland, Second Cup, Yogurty's, Yogen Fruz, OLLY shoes, Higher Ground, What-A-Bagel, fashion retailer Thyme Maternity, and Canadian children's clothing company Hatley.

Srulovicz and her partner, Stephanie Kleiman, met online.

"The business was growing very quickly, and Tal was looking for a partner, so she posted an ad online," Kleiman said. "Our chemistry was great. I am a marketing person and complimented Tal's background as a lawyer with fundraising and non-profit experience."

With a business plan in place, Srulovicz and Kleiman set up the clubmom.ca website as an online destination for mothers to get sound advice and practical tips on how to shop and save money every day. Moms can also tap into the 20-plus expert panel of bloggers who provide original content each week on issues such as parenting, health, fitness, sex, relationships and entertainment.

"I set out to put together a team of bloggers with varied expertise. We wanted to be different than other bloggers out there targeting moms – we wanted to include professionals and experts to add content versus just mommy stories," said Kleiman.

Clubmom has grown to 10,000 active users of its card program, and its website attracts 20,000 views per month.

"What makes us unique is that our vendors are hand-picked. We spend a lot of time networking with other moms, speaking to them about whom they want to see on board. At this point, we're getting vendor referrals from our member base about who they want us to approach," said Srulovicz.

"We are the demographic. We are targeting people like us: moms. Moms are our business and they talk a lot – whether in person or on Facebook, Twitter, Instagram or Pinterest. We have been fortunate with our more than 200 businesses that are promoting us to their clients. We have bright pink stickers in the windows of our participating vendors. Through our school fundraising, we have been able to reach out to moms via school newsletters to help us build the brand," Kleiman added.

Clubmom's focus in 2014 is to grow.

"Our goal for this year is to hit 300 vendors, and we want to expand the blog. We're constantly adding bloggers, not just in the GTA, but also across Canada. We hope to build a presence in cities across Canada and grow nationally.

"We are currently re-launching the website to read as more of a magazine style, so that content is more forward and accessible," said Srulovicz.

The shop-and-save loyalty card can be purchased for $30 on the website and is also available through charitable organizations, community fundraisers, most Jewish day schools, the Toronto District School Board and many private schools.

The songbooks of Leonard Cohen

The Wordless Leonard Cohen Songbook George A. Walker.

Limited artist's edition of 80 copies; Trade paperback, The Porcupine's Quill.

Reviewed by Norman Ravvin

Songbooks were once a plentiful commodity. An updated presentation of old-time sheet music, they were packaged with glossy covers, photographs of the artist, excerpts from interviews, and chord diagrams to help the beginning player.

In my suburban youth, the local mall boasted a music store where I could safely count on finding songbooks for all of Leonard Cohen's records in the $5 to $10 range. Who else was on the prowl in southwest Calgary, circa 1980, for the tablature instructions to Chelsea Hotel #2, I cannot say. But Bob Ingles Music at Chinook Centre was happy to sell me a copy.

In the late '60s and early '70s, Cohen's music publishers were savvy about how to cash in on his mystique. His songbooks included plenty of cinema-ready close-ups, and lyrics were laid out, as in poetry stanzas, separate from the music notation. This was accompanied by interviews from magazines and newspapers, full of Cohen's pithy and at times oracular pronouncements (he was waiting, one insisted, for "women to take over the world.")

George A. Walker's Wordless Leonard Cohen Songbook is a print artist's reimagining of what a Cohen songbook might be. Most notably, it contains images – 80 of them – one for each of Cohen's 80 years. Each image is carved into the endgrain of a hardwood block, then printed on the Vandercook press in Walker's west Toronto studio.

The Wordless Leonard Cohen Songbook is Walker's third "wordless biography." He first presented the life, artistic apprenticeship and mysterious death of Group of Seven painter Tom Thomson. After this, in 2013, Walker moved in an entirely different direction, as he created 100 images for The Life and Times of Conrad Black. Walker's choice of his subject followed from his appraisal of Black as "one of the most outspoken and charismatic characters in the elusive one per cent of people who make up the establishment in Canada. He is a public person of international stature, at one time a media baron and still a man of great influence and wealth." Black was not averse to Walker's interpretation of his life, and agreed to sign a few copies.

Leonard Cohen, a celebrated figure in Canada and abroad, is a less provocative choice. Cohen's career has included idiosyncratic periods when he faded from view, and released books of poetry and record albums that reached only a hard core audience of aficionados. Some of this work, arguably, is his best. It is in his later and less creatively exciting years that he has gained a mass audience. These days, Cohen's songs are covered by the likes of Lana Del Ray, whose young fans are unlikely to know what he had in mind as he sang about the limousines waiting in the street outside the Chelsea Hotel.

Walker's wordless narrative follows Cohen from his Westmount youth, through his McGill years under the influence of poet-teacher Louis Dudek, to his penchant for writing poems in $5 rooms on Montreal's tenderloin, to iconic meetings on Canadian television with Pierre Berton. He then leaps into the late '60s, when Cohen's musical career put him in the company of the key makers of that period's popular culture. Among these are Andy Warhol, Allen Ginsberg, Joni Mitchell and Jimi Hendrix. For those interested in the finer details of Cohen's doings, Walker includes portraits of Nico, Phil Spector and Cohen's poetic hero Garcia Lorca.

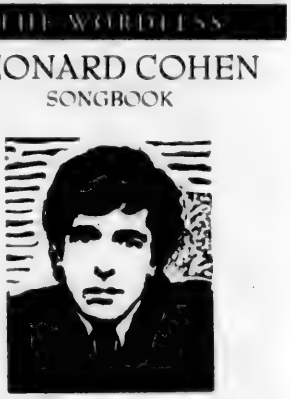
Walker's woodcut style is rich and varied. He sometimes cuts an image to mimic an actual photo, coming to terms with the challenge of how to carve the tiny typescript on an unspooling sheet of paper, or cigarette smoke blown casually upward.

Some of his prints are wholly imagined, and these are suggestive of his ideas about Cohen's creative process, his status as a bard and a troubadour. In one case, he sets out the images from a song, the "tea and oranges that come all the way from China," in Suzanne.

The careful viewer might wonder, beyond this, what is there of song in Walker's wordless songbook? There are many images of Cohen performing his songs, and it's fun to try to pin down the chords his fingers are forming. Walker has made his own version of an early photograph, which appeared in the 1969 songbook Songs of Leonard Cohen, showing Cohen's teenage musical group, The Buckskin Boys. Alongside it he has set an imaginary portrait: a youthful Cohen in western hat, overseen by the real cowboy singer, Hank Williams, who is positioned, as Cohen says he must be, "a thousand floors" above him in the Tower of Song.

The Wordless Leonard Cohen Songbook demands close and careful viewing. In this, it is like cinema, or the photographic work of a Richard Avedon or Diane Arbus. Each image is full, suggestive and rich in context and style.

The book's creation is a complex process and follows the model set by Walker's previous wordless biographies. First he creates a limited edition of hand-printed copies. These arrive in a carefully detailed box, are composed of engravings printed on Walker's press, are hand bound, signed and expensive. When I visited a limited edition of The Mysterious Death of Tom Thomson at McGill's Rare Books Library, I felt as if I were turning the pages of a paper treasure, a piece of art I could hold, if only for a short while, in my own two hands.



A trade paperback is due out at a modest price from Erin, Ont.-based Porcupine's Quill. Just as I did in my teenage years, the Lana Del Ray fans may stumble upon Walker's songbook in their local megastore and muse over his interpretation of Chelsea Hotel #2. The limousines are, of course, still waiting in the street.

Book has a moving pay-it-forward message

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

A Toronto man is hoping to spread a bit of kindness with a kids' book that raises money for the Gerry & Nancy Pencer Brain Tumor Centre at the Princess Margaret Hospital.

Fred Levine wrote Triple Trouble: One Good Deed Deserves Another, a book about his four kids, including 12-year-old triplets. He said the book is meant to acknowledge his family's love and support as he goes through life with brain cancer.

"It's a children's book that's a celebration of my family during difficult times," Levine, 47, said. "Despite my struggle with brain cancer, which is three years and counting, I found a way not to lose sight of who I am."

Levine, who has a background in advertising and marketing, said he hasn't been working since he was diagnosed with the tumour. Not wanting to sit at home feeling miserable, he said he focused his efforts on writing and illustrating the book, which is about how small acts of kindness can have such a positive effect on people, influencing them to spread the kindness around.

Fred Levine

"Every crisis serves as an opportunity to make a difference," he said. "This is my crisis and it's a little bout of brain cancer, but here's my opportunity to demonstrate it's not going to hold me back."

The fact that he's able to thank his family through the book while also contributing to the organization that has been helping him and many others was a big bonus, he said.

Every penny from the book sales goes to the Pencer Centre.

Since its release in late October, sales of the book have raised $2,000 for the Gerry & Nancy Pencer Brain Trust.

Linda McKie, executive administrator for the brain trust, said the book's message, as well as Levine's writing and illustrating talents, are what made them decide to publish it.

"It had such a beautiful theme, a pay-it-forward message. We just loved that message. It's a book that deserves to be published," she said.

Levine said he has plans for more Triple Trouble books, which he hopes will inspire people to do good.

"I wanted it to be a positive story," he said. "I just wanted smiles and I wanted people to get it, and if it makes people kinder, I couldn't ask for more than that."

HOLOCAUST ORATORIO COMPOSED BY SURVIVOR OF BERGEN-BELSEN TO BE PERFORMED IN VICTORIA

The University of Victoria's Faculty of Humanities is presenting the world premiere of A Twentieth Century Passion, a Holocaust memorial oratorio by A. Peter Gary, a survivor of the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp.

The oratorio, which is essentially an opera without action or sets, will feature an orchestra, a choir, a children's choir, several soloists and a child narrator. The performance is slated for April 2, the anniversary of the composer's liberation and two weeks before his 90th birthday.

Born in 1924 into an upper-middle class Jewish family in Hungary, Gary studied music as a youth. During the Holocaust, he escaped a mass slaughter in which his mother was killed, and he spent three years in Majdanek, Dachau and Bergen-Belsen. He was liberated by the British Army on his 21st birthday, then achieved a PhD in musicology from the Sorbonne.

After immigrating to the United States in 1950, he worked in the Hollywood film industry, composed music, developed several businesses and taught at the University of California. He moved to Victoria in 1991 and founded the Victoria Holocaust Remembrance and Education Society under the auspices of which Holocaust-education talks have been given to more than 65,000 children and teens.

New in Print: Famed Yiddish writer Sholem Aleichem endured an impoverished childhood, married into fabulous wealth, but then lost it all through bad luck and terrible business sense. His work as a writer and performer of his work brought him immense success and celebrity: more than 150,000 people were said to have attended his funeral in New York in 1916. Creator of the Tevye the Dairyman stories that were later packaged as Fiddler On The Roof, Sholem Aleichem has achieved a posthumous fame that would have likely extended beyond his wildest dreams.

Jeremy Dauber, a professor of Yiddish literature at Columbia University, has written what is being billed as "the first comprehensive biography" of this beloved author. Dauber's The Worlds of Sholem Aleichem: The Remarkable Life and Afterlife of the Man Who Created Tevye, was recently published in a 448-page softcover edition by Schocken/Nextbook.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Teatron play hopes to appeal to local Israelis

Kathryn Kates
Special to the CJN

Actor Tal Rosenzweig is hoping her current play Handle With Care will attract members of the Israeli Canadian community to the Teatron Toronto Jewish Theatre.

"Because this play has both Israeli and Jewish content in it, I think it's a really good opportunity to bring more Israelis to the theatre," the Israeli-born actor says. "There are a lot of Canadian Jews coming to Teatron, but there is not as much awareness within the Israeli community about this theatre. It is a very uplifting play, and I hope that both Israeli and Canadian Jewish audiences give it a chance and come to see it."

Rosenzweig makes her Teatron Toronto Jewish Theatre debut in Handle with Care, a romantic comedy by Emmy Award-nominated writer Jason Odell Williams, at the Toronto Centre for the Arts – Studio Theatre beginning Feb.20

Handle with Care won the coveted New York Times Critic Pick for its current off-Broadway production. Rosenzweig's castmates include Teatron veterans Zack Amzallag, Tal Shulman and Gloria Valentine.

"The play takes place in a remote town called Goodview in Virginia," she says. "My character's name is Ayelet, she's in her 30s and she's single. She follows her grandmother who left Israel because she wanted to visit Goodview, but Ayelet doesn't know the real reason for the trip.

"Unexpectedly, her grandmother passes away. Then she finds out the courier, who was to deliver her in the casket back to Israel, loses the casket. He can't speak Hebrew and she can't speak English, so he brings a friend, Josh, who is Jewish so that he can try to understand her. There is a lot of miscommunication and the comedy comes from there."

Through all the goings on, a love story unfolds between Ayelet and Josh, played by Amzallag. Rosenzweig says that in-between the comedy that surrounds the disappearance of the casket there are flashbacks showing Ayelet's time with her grandmother. The audience gets to see the relationship between grandmother and granddaughter, and eventually learns the reason for their trip to Virginia.

Tal Rosenzweig

"Handle with Care brings up the whole question whether things happen because of destiny, or is it just random," says Rosenzweig, who now makes Toronto her home. "It would be interesting if the audience left with this question in mind."

She says the fact that her character is Israeli and that she herself comes from the same culture really helped her to have a better picture of who Ayelet is.

Rosenzweig began performing at the age of 12. Then, when she was an engineering student in California, she had the opportunity to perform in an original play call Edges at the Silicon Valley Theatre. Now an electrical engineer by day, her passion is still the theatre. She has spent six years performing for Mifgash, a Toronto Hebrew-speaking theatre company.

At the beginning of April, Rosenzweig, who enjoys reading and salsa dancing in her spare time, will perform once again for Mifgash in a musical called Kazablan.

Handle with Care runs from Feb. 20 to March 2. Tickets at Ticketmaster, or 1-855-985-ARTS or www.teatrontheatre.com.

Rescuing Chagall's paintings, abandoning Chagall

Rafael Medoff
JNS.org

The Monuments Men, tells the thrilling story of U.S. military personnel who risked their lives during World War II to rescue paintings by the likes of Rembrandt, Picasso, and Chagall that the Nazis had stolen.

But for Connecticut civil rights attorney Bill Bingham, the story is one of tragic irony. His father, Hiram Bingham IV, was a dissident U.S. diplomat who helped rescue Marc Chagall after the Roosevelt administration abandoned the painter – the same administration that later made such efforts to recover Chagall's paintings. Save the artwork, abandon the artist? It's a peculiar legacy, as Bingham explains in this exclusive interview.

JNS: Is it true that Chagall was initially reluctant to leave Europe?

Bingham: Chagall had lived in France for most of the previous two decades. Like many Jews, he felt bound to it by family ties, by the familiar sights and sounds and pleasures, and of course by the general uncertainty that goes with starting a new life halfway across the world. So when the pro-Nazi Vichy government took over in 1940, he wasn't immediately ready to make the break.

How did your father come into contact with him?

Dad was a vice-consul at the American consulate in Marseilles. Officially he was supposed to implement the Roosevelt administration's visa policy, which was basically to look for reasons to reject visa applications from Jewish refugees. But unofficially, Dad was actively helping Varian Fry, an American journalist who came to France in 1940 to rescue refugees.

How did the U.S. government respond to Fry's mission?

Under pressure from [his wife] Eleanor Roosevelt, the president very reluctantly agreed to let Fry rescue a few hundred prominent European intellectuals and artists. FDR could accept the idea of saving the 'cream of European civilization.' Helping ordinary Jewish refugees was a different story, unfortunately.

What exactly did your father do to help Fry?

He surreptitiously issued travel documents for refugees – documents that the other consular officials refused to approve. He hid refugees in his home when they were fleeing from the Nazis. He even helped smuggle the famous novelist Lion Feuchtwanger out of a French forced-labour camp – he had Feuchtwanger dress in women's clothes and pretend to be my dad's mother-in-law. It wasn't just Fry and Bingham – Fry built a network of several-dozen rescue activists, some of them French, some of them American expats who were living in Europe.

So what happened to Chagall?

In the fall of 1940, the Museum of Modern Art applied to the State Department for a visa for Chagall. The museum promised that it would have exhibits of Chagall's paintings and would make sure that he could support himself. But that wasn't enough, apparently. The administration stalled and stalled on the application. Months went by. Finally, Fry took Chagall to see my father. Fry wrote in his diary that on the spot, my father 'got him an immigration visa with no affidavits at all. In fact, all he had in his dossier was a letter from me [Fry].'

The delays were almost fatal. Because of all the stalling, Chagall was still in France when the Vichy police carried out a huge roundup of Jews in April 1941, and Chagall was imprisoned.

Fry and my father personally intervened to get him out. Chagall and his wife, Bella, left Spain on May 7, 1941. If it had been left up to the Roosevelt administration, he might never have gotten out.

And his paintings?

The Chagalls managed to take some of the artwork with them. But some of it was left behind. And of course some of it was in museums or private collections in Europe—which is how the Monuments Men ended up finding some of it, three years later.

Jewish life flourishes in Baltimore

Michael Stavsky
Special to The CJN

When thinking about major Jewish communities in North America, several come to mind right away. New York, Los Angeles and even Toronto have large communities nestled within major urban centres.

You might be surprised, however, to learn that Baltimore, Md., with over 60,000 Jewish residents throughout the county, has one of the country's oldest and fastest growing Jewish communities.

The city of Baltimore played a significant role during both the War of 1812 and later the U.S. Civil War, as a strategic deepwater port with easy access to Chesapeake Bay and the Atlantic Ocean. It was during this period that Baltimore's Jewish community quickly grew into one of the largest ethnic neighbourhoods in the city, establishing itself along Lombard Street, just east of downtown. The area, affectionately called "Corned Beef Row", was so named due to the numerous Jewish delis that sprang up in the area. In 1929, the Baltimore Hebrew Times referred to East Baltimore as "a little city in itself" due to its uniformly Jewish populace.

While the community today has taken root in northwest Baltimore, a few vestiges of Corned Beef Row remain. Two large synagogues from the 1800s still stand in the area. B'nai Israel, a grandiose Moorish Revival design built in 1876 as Chizuk Amuno Synagogue, is the city's longest actively operating shul. Having been established in protest to the liturgical change from Orthodox to Reform occurring at the Baltimore Hebrew Congregation, the synagogue still operates as Orthodox today, in contrast to many other synagogues from the period.

The Lloyd Street Synagogue, situated next door to B'nai Israel, no longer functions as a synagogue. Built in 1840, the Greek Revival-designed synagogue was the first in the state of Maryland, and is currently the third oldest synagogue building in the United States. Started by German Jews as Congregation Nidche Israel, the Lloyd Street shul was also the pulpit for the first rabbi to serve in the United States, Rabbi Abraham Rice.

By the 1960s, Baltimore's Jewish community had begun to migrate to fashionable northwest Baltimore. Spread out along the east side of Reisterstown Road in the Park Heights and Pikesville sections of town, the Jews of Baltimore have a large Orthodox constituency, in sharp contrast to many other North American cities. In fact, a 2010 Jewish Federation study showed a higher percentage of Orthodox residents (32 per cent) than Conservative (26 per cent) and Reform (23 per cent).

In recent years, the city has done much to curb the high crime rate and urban blight that plagues much of Baltimore.

The revitalized inner harbour, adjacent to downtown, has become a trendy spot for retailers and visitors alike. The Maryland Science Center and critically acclaimed National Aquarium of Baltimore are a short walk apart, along with the circa 1854 USS Constellation, the last all sail warship built by the United States.

In an effort to attract commerce to the city, numerous early 20th-century factories and warehouses were converted into high-end shopping districts during the 1990s.

The Power Plant building, built in 1900, retains its original appearance as an electrical power station, but now houses numerous shops and eateries.

The B&O Warehouse, located in nearby Camden Yards, was built for the Baltimore and Ohio railway in 1899, and is among the longest brick buildings in the United States. Measuring more than 330 metres from end to end, it stood vacant for much of the 1970s and 1980s. It was later redeveloped as part of the Oriole Park at Camden Yards baseball stadium complex, and is now office space for the Baltimore Orioles franchise.

Camden Yards is home to several interesting museums. Geppi's Entertainment Museum, a large gallery depicting American entertainment history, includes vintage collectibles and novelties from more than a century of American radio, television and movies.

The museum shares space with the Sports Legends Museum dedicated to Baltimore area sports history, with the Babe Ruth birthplace museum a short Charm City Circulator bus ride away.

Whether visiting nearby Washington D.C., or as a destination itself, Baltimore truly embodies its moniker as the "Charm City."

SPREAD KINDNESS, NOT DRUNKEN RECKLESSNESS

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

Two childhood friends from Toronto are joining other young people around the world who are putting a positive twist on a potentially dangerous Internet craze, spurring their peers to do a mitzvah in an effort called Feed the Deed.

Russell Citron and Josh Stern, both 22, watched a YouTube video earlier this month of Brent Lindeque, a South African who gave a homeless man a sandwich, chocolate bar and Coke.

Lindeque's selfless act inspired them to be Good Samaritans. Citron bought a cupcake for a random person during his lunch break. Stern handed out sandwiches to homeless people as he walked home from an exam at the University of Ottawa, where he's a medical student. Both uploaded videos of their good deeds to Facebook.

When Citron found out that Stern was doing something similar – with a clip that featured the catchy slogan and hashtag #feedthedeed – he called Stern in the hope of aligning the idea with his own non-profit organization, Kindness Counts.

"We both agreed that the goal here is to make the biggest impact possible and inspire people to be kind," says Citron, president of Kindness Counts and a consultant at Monitor Deloitte. "From there, the response [on social media] has been really inspiring."

Feed the Deed and Lindeque's challenge are a more positive spin on Neknominations, a drinking challenge that has gone viral online and which Lindeque changed to become a challenge to perform acts of kindness.

For Neknominations, young adults post footage of chugging (or "necking") a drink and then dare their friends to do something even more outrageous, usually involving binge drinking. The online challenge has been linked to two deaths in Ireland.

At the end of their videos, Citron and Stern each nominated three friends to continue doing random acts of kindness within 24 hours, then record a video or take photos of their kind acts, share them on Facebook and forward the challenge to a few more friends.

"It feels really good to help people, and you might as well put your money to good use instead of booze," Stern wrote in a Feed the Deed Facebook post, hoping to shift friends away from the unhealthy viral sensation.

A week after it began, Stern says the movement had inspired more than 250 Feed the Deed videos, and its reach is expanding by the day.

"I was raised in a very loving family built on a very strong foundation of giving back and kindness," says Stern, who has volunteered with Magen David Adom in Israel. "I've always been a strong believer in acts of kindness and this is the perfect project for something like that."

Citron's non-profit initiative, Kindness Counts, is focused on spreading kindness in creative ways. It shares its initials with Citron's uncle, Ken Citron, who died of cancer in 2004. The organization is a tribute to him.

"I think that society views kindness as a very passive concept," he says. "There's some attitude toward being kind now that it's not the cool thing to do. It's not fun. But in order to really make an impact and get people talking at their dinner tables, you have to be creative and unconventional in the way you address kindness."

One of Stern's nominated friends, Ben Cowley, went to Tim Hortons and gave a staffer at the drive-through window $35 to pay for the warm drinks of the customers behind him.

"It felt good," Cowley says. "I liked the idea of being anonymous, reminding us that sometimes people are just out there to do something nice and cheer people up without recognition."

Feed the Deed and Lindeque aren't the only ones around the world putting a more positive spin on the Neknominations concept.

RAK (Random Acts of Kindness) Nominations is a craze that launched in Australia and became very popular when the #raknominations tag trended on Twitter. Social media has been key to mobilizing so much generosity among the public.

"I was so excited immediately when I heard about this," says Nicole Rosenberg, president of the Jewish Student Union at Forest Hill Collegiate in Toronto. "It's such a positive initiative. I thought that was a much better way to use social media [than Neknominations]."

Among the people nominated to keep feeding the deed are celebrities such as NBA superstar LeBron James (whom Citron nominated), astronaut Chris Hadfield and comedian and talk show host Ellen DeGeneres.

Citron also posted a message on the Kindness Counts Facebook page asking friends to nominate and tag the Ellen DeGeneres Show with the hope of spreading Feed the Deed to a North American audience.

Many Feed the Deed videos are in a hub on the Kindness Counts Facebook page. Citron told The CJN that he's considering making the kindness initiative an annual event every February.

"It's incredibly inspiring to see how many people actually go out and do acts of kindness and care," Citron says. "If this entire initiative just inspired one video, if it made just one person's day… the entire thing would be worth it."

For updates on Feed the Deed as it moves forward, "like" the Kindness Counts page on Facebook.

Downsizing a hoarder

Ask Ella
By Ella Burakowski

Dear Ella,

My wife and I have lived in our large home for almost 40 years. We've raised three children and have seven grandchildren. My wife has kept just about every memento, from baby teeth to artwork to report cards. Our bedrooms, garage, den and basement are packed with memories. We're getting older, and climbing up and down our stairs is difficult. We need to move, but she won't hear of it. How am I going to convince her?

Married to a Hoarder

Dear Married to a Hoarder

Compacting, discarding and choosing through a lifetime of memories may just seem too insurmountable to your wife. Where do you start? What's important? Every item has a memory or a story attached. Just the thought of what lies ahead to get to your goal is daunting. But if you really want to get this done you can – together. Do a little research first so when you present the idea to your wife, you'll have the solutions to all her objections.

If you look at the whole picture, it will be too overwhelming – almost impossible. So don't take that approach.

First, talk about the safety issue. If you want any kind of control of your future, you're better off doing this while it's still physically possible and before there's an accident, like a fall, which will force a lifestyle change.

Take one room, one closet and one drawer at a time. Separate your piles into items to distribute, donations, garbage and keepers. Take a photo of that Grade 2 report card or the finger painting, and store many of the memories on a computer. One of your grandkids can help with that. Make it fun – offer them an incentive to help. They'll feel good about it and you'll enjoy spending extra time together.

There are professional companies that can help. You're not alone with this daunting task, but first you both have to admit you want to move.

Second, you have to be realistic about the work ahead, and third, ask or pay for help. Write down your plan and make sure each step can be executed. Create a rule, such as if you haven't seen, used or touch something in a year, out it goes! Give yourselves a daily quota and stick to it. It took a lifetime to accumulate all of your stuff, and it will take time to downsize, but you'll get through this if you keep your eye on the prize: moving to a newer, more manageable lifestyle.

Dear Ella,

One friend fails to tell me about singles parties and another "good " friend fails to do me favours when I ask. Both gals are eager to contact me, though, to listen to their problems. I've always been a good ear and consider myself a good friend, but I'm disappointed in them and feel resentful. I'm considering cutting them both loose, as I just want sincere friendship with people who have my back and look out for me.

Disappointed

Dear Disappointed

Loyalty and friendship go hand in hand. If a friendship is one-sided, it isn't really a friendship. You have come across two gals with whom you have that kind of relationship.

First, look at yourself objectively. Are your "favours" realistic or are they a burden? Are your expectations of what you consider friendship too high? The way it stands now, you don't feel the friendship scale is balanced, and if these two people are in fact close, you should be able to have that discussion. It's not easy, but it may be a good investment in the health of your relationship with them.

Ultimately, this is your decision. If you feel you want to invest the time and emotional energy to fix things, then go for it. Right now, you feel resentful, so there's no option of leaving the situation the way it is.

Some people are just more emotionally draining than others. They don't mean to be, nor do they realize they behave that way. Some even try to listen to your problems, but really are only biding their time till they can jump in and turn the attention back to themselves. It doesn't make them bad people, maybe just a bit needy.

I understand you're getting frustrated and probably feel a little used. Don't give up too quickly. Good friends are precious and are worth the effort.

Be prepared, though: you may be surprised to hear something about yourself you were not aware of either.

Are you bored with making the same recipes every week? Are you looking for ways to get inspired in the kitchen? Look no further. Estee Kafra's latest cookbook, Cooking Inspired: Bringing Creativity and Passion Back into the Kitchen, features more than 200 creative recipes and fabulous full-colour photographs. Many of the recipes are from her website, www.KosherScoop.com, one of the fastest-growing websites for kosher recipes, cooking articles and cooking videos. Her business partner, Dassi Slater, is in charge of ensuring that their website runs efficiently and smoothly.

Cooking Inspired features a collection of more than 200 creative, triple-tested recipes, plus kitchen tips and ideas that will help keep you inspired. There are more than 100 gluten-free and Passover recipes. You'll find amazing appetizers, dips and spreads, beautiful brunch dishes, hearty homemade breads, nourishing soups, creative salads, fabulous fish recipes, marvelous main courses for holidays or every day, scrumptious side dishes, plus a variety of delectable desserts, cookies and bars.

Kafra's recipes include traditional kosher classics as well as creative, trendy dishes for those cooks who are more adventurous: Squash Pear Soup, Roasted Vegetable Shakshouka, Spinach, Mandarin and Almond Salad, Simple Sesame Glazed Fish, Slow-Cooked English Ribs or Spare Ribs, Fruity Moroccan Chicken, Best Burgers Ever, Honey Balsamic Rice, Onion-Noodle Kugel, Marble Pound Cake, Chocolate Babke, Sweet Squash Muffins, Decadent Halva Ice Cream Cake, Almond Toffee Squares and Jazzed-Up Bread Pudding.

Cooking Inspired also features recipes from several well-known cookbook authors and chefs, including Daphna Rabinovitch, Paula Shoyer, Levana Kirschenbaum, David Blum, Sam Kanner and myself.

Estee Kafra is very artistic and an extremely talented food photographer – she did her own photography for the book. This is her third cookbook. When I recently interviewed Kafra, we discussed her passion for preparing beautiful, delicious food and the simple things that inspired her in the kitchen.

When I asked her why she decided to write Cooking Inspired, she replied: "It's very important for me to inspire people to get into the kitchen and cook. I want them to think outside of the box. The recipes in Cooking Inspired are simple to make and taste terrific. These are the dishes that I love to cook for my family and friends. I found I was cooking 'safe' meals for my kids, meals that I knew they would eat and that wouldn't cause too much grumbling. I knew that something had to change. I planted my herb garden and got my kids involved. I talked to them about all the amazing ingredients that are available to us."

She continued: "The world around us inspires me. In order to make the most of the world we live in, we need to open our hearts and our minds to the inspiration all around us, to the myriad of experiences and items that can shape our everyday lives. Food is so central to our religion. Friday night is one of the highlights of the Jewish week. Here are some of my favourite dishes that I love to serve for Shabbat, simple classics but with a creative, contemporary twist. That's cooking inspired!"

MAPLE ROAST

Kafra said, when her friend Rachelli came by with this roast after she had her son Chaim, she was positive that she had put chocolate in it. "Chocolate is always on my mind and the roast's sweet scent with rich tones of flavour all but convinced me. (Did I mention that I was a chocoholic?) Alas, I blamed my inability to detect the inclusion of maple syrup and soy sauce on my post-partum status, but based on the success of this recipe, I would have to guess this was one of the best baby gifts I ever received. A great recipe is the kind of present you use over and over again.

1 brisket or brick roast (about 3-4 lb.)
3 tbsp. Dijon mustard
2 onions, sliced
2 sweet potatoes, cut into large chunks
1 cup red baby potatoes, cut in half kosher salt and freshly ground black pepper, to taste
1/2 cup maple syrup
1/3 cup soy sauce

Preheat oven to 350. Spread the Dijon mustard over the sides and top of the roast.

Arrange the onions in the bottom of a Dutch oven. Top with the sweet and baby potatoes. Place the meat on top of the potatoes.

Sprinkle the salt and pepper evenly over the meat and potatoes. Stir together the maple syrup and soy sauce in a small bowl. Pour over the meat. Cover the Dutch oven and bake for 2 1/2 hours. Let cool. Chill overnight.

Slice the meat, return to the pot with the vegetables. Reheat in a 250-degree oven until warmed through. Makes 12 servings.

JAZZED-UP BREAD PUDDING

Kafra said she is "so excited about this recipe. There is something so rustic and enticing about bread pudding (especially when there is a whole challah left over from Shabbat to use). I incorporate unusual flavours, like orange and cardamom, and even the most conservative of my guests loved the combination.

1 medium challah
5 large eggs
1 cup + 3 tbsp. granulated sugar
1/2 cup oil
1 pkg (3.3 oz) instant vanilla pudding
4 Granny Smith/Gala apples, peeled, cored and thinly sliced
1 tbsp. cinnamon
3/4 tsp. ground cardamom
2 tsp. grated orange zest
1/2 cup raisins or dried cherries

Peel or cut away the crust from the challah. Tear the challah into large pieces and soak in a large bowl of water for 30 minutes. Discard the water. Squeeze out any remaining water by pushing the wet challah against a colander.

Preheat the oven to 350. Grease a 13x9-in. baking pan (or grease 16 4-oz. ramekins).

Transfer the challah to a large bowl. Add the eggs, 1 cup of the sugar, oil and pudding mix, mixing well.

Stir in the apples, spices, orange zest and raisins. Transfer the mixture to the prepared pan or ramekins. Sprinkle with the remaining 3 tbsp. of sugar.

Bake in the centre of the preheated oven for 1 hour or until golden. Serve with warm pancake syrup or maple syrup. Makes 16 servings

Friend's 'little sister' becomes his wife

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

For Kayla Goldrich Bernick and Josh Bernick, it might not have been love at first sight but it definitely turned into more happiness than either of them ever dreamed.

Josh, 25, had known Kayla for years before they started dating – he was good friends with her older brother, was often at her house hanging out with him and spending Shabbat dinners. "I think he may have been using my family to get close to me," laughed Kayla.

After years knowing her as his friend's little sister, he hoped there might be something more there. "I probably asked her out a billion times before she finally said yes to me," said Josh.

"Once she finally did agree to go out with me, it was just the best decision, hopefully, she's ever made in her life, and the best decision I ever made was to keep going. We've been together for four years and every day is way better than the last day."

His persistence paid off. Once they were together, they both said they knew they had found something special. "He was literally the nicest person I've ever met in my entire life. He just genuinely wants everyone around him to be happy," said Kayla. Because they were friends first, it didn't take long before they entered a comfortable stage in their relationship.

"We're just happy to be in each other's company," she said. "We always settled into that quite early and I think that's why marriage has been so easy for us."

The proposal was carefully planned, down to the last detail – but it almost didn't go off as planned. "I made it super hard for him," said Kayla.

"I was at school and he messaged me and said come over when you have your break, but it was a snow storm. Then he said he'd cook me lunch and I said I'm coming," she recalled.

"I drove over, opened the door, there was music playing, and yellow rose petals leading to the first door – yellow is my favourite colour. The first door said 'open me' and in the kitchen was a collage of all the fun things we've done together, hung from the ceiling on these yellow streamers and pieces of yellow cardboard. Then there were rose petals on the floor leading to the table, with an envelope that said 'read me.' I read this note that he wrote for me that was really sweet. And then it said to go to the next door. On the door were pictures of us and it said 'open me.'

"So I opened the final door and Josh was kneeling there in his freshly pressed tux on the floor with a ring in his hand and a bouquet of yellow flowers. And he said 'will you marry me?' I said after all that I will."

They were married Oct. 14, 2013 and said the past few months have been the best of their lives. "Somebody went up to Josh the other day and said honestly we've never seen Kayla so happy," she said.

Although they're both very busy –Kayla is finishing law school and Josh is in his first year of medical school – they make sure their priorities are making each other happy every day.

"I've only been married for four months but the best advice is to make sure your wife is always happy. If you go the extra mile to make sure she's happy, you're going to have a very strong marriage," he said.

Longtime friendship turns to romance

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

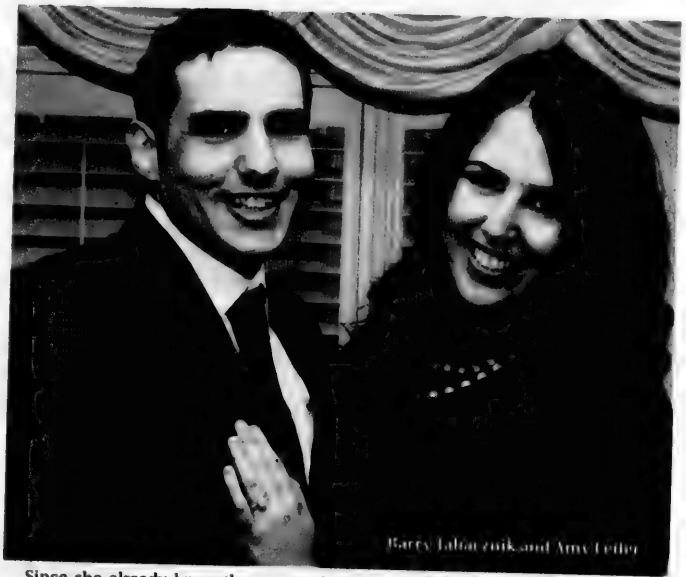
It's not always easy keeping a long distance relationship alive, but for Amy Leifer and Barry Tabacznik, it was definitely worth it – they got engaged this past December after dating for two years, and plan to marry in June.

Leifer and Tabacznik had met as teenagers but never pursued each other as a romantic interest until years later.

"We always knew each other and one day we just started talking and then we started to go out. It was very natural the way it happened," said Leifer, 26. For part of the time they were dating, Tabacznik was in school in Winnipeg while Leifer was in Toronto, so he would often plan romantic surprises for her.

"He would always do small things for me. One time he sent me a bouquet of flowers when he was away in school. The front desk said these are for you and I was like where did these come from? I was really surprised. He's very spontaneous," she said.

After over a year of dating, she said they both knew they were ready to take the next step. "We just knew. It was a good time in our lives. We could be able to start a life together. It was just a matter of time to propose," she said.



Barry Tabacznik and Amy Leifer

Since she already knew the proposal was coming soon, Tabacznik tried to throw her off the trail. "For two weeks before he proposed, he always had a box with him. I totally freaked out and I didn't know what he was doing. I was so confused. So he was very sneaky," she said.

Finally, one Sunday morning he called and said he had a problem at work and he had to go in – even though they had plans to spend the day together. "I said do you need me to come in and help you and he said yes. He knew I would offer. I get ready and head down there. I go in and I start to hear music and I see he has flower petals on the floor going up to the desk and a big present wrapped," she said.

"I knew the present was this big dog we had seen at Costco, and I was joking and I said if you need an idea for Chanukah, you can get this dog for me. I'm a dog lover. It's a huge dog like you'd win from Canada's Wonderland. Then I turned around to look at the dog again and in the mouth of the dog was the ring. He gets down on one knee and he says this whole sweet thing and says will you marry and I say yes – I didn't even let him finish the question, I was so excited."

They're looking forward to celebrating with their friends and family, especially those coming in from out of town, at their wedding in June.

"I'm excited to start a home together, leaving the nest and building our own nest," said Tabacznik, 29 "And having Amy test all the foods I'm going to cook for her."

Nothing more romantic than coming home, say Canadian olim

Jennifer Tzivia MacLeod
Special to the CJN

There's no place like home to celebrate an anniversary, but for the many Canadians living in Israel (25,000, according to estimates quoted by Prime Minister Stephen Harper on his recent visit), Israel has become home – and a place to find and establish new anniversary traditions. Or, in the case of my husband and I, who made aliyah with our two youngest kids last August, a place where an anniversary can fall by the wayside in the overwhelming balagan of establishing a new life.

It wasn't supposed to be that way. The Hebrew date of our wedding anniversary falls on the second day of the month of Shvat, easy to remember because schools and kindergartens are all busy gearing up for Tu b'Shvat. Still, the date came and went, and nothing happened. We're still waiting, searching for an opportunity to celebrate.

With our move here, of course, we lost our free babysitters back in Toronto. But it's not just about the money. It is more about networking, finding someone we like and trust enough to babysit.

Isolation is common during most couples' first years in Israel, although organizations like Nefesh b'Nefesh do their best to create social interactions with other English speakers. Ironically, that means it's probably even more important to commemorate special events in a wonderful way.

"We probably won't be celebrating it officially this year," says my friend Rachel, who also moved to Israel last summer, leaving behind in-laws who babysat. "Maybe next year, we'll try to get a babysitter, go out to dinner and a movie."

That's always been our default anniversary celebration, too – the dinner-date, maybe with a movie. With four children and busy lives, it's always been very special to just take an evening off and gaze at each other, ideally over a romantically flickering candle, but we're not too picky.

Rachel is more philosophical than I am. "The romantic… part for us is that we're alive; we didn't kill each other." She's only half-joking. "When you look back over what you've done… you've moved to Israel with a spouse. The fact that we're still together, speaking to each other, loving each other deeply… it's very powerful."

Of course, there is hope over the horizon, for both of us.

Veteran Toronto oleh Stephen Epstein, who made aliyah in 2005 with his wife Alison and two young children, used a special anniversary and milestone birthday in November 2012 as an excuse to join in the Israeli national obsession and travel to Asia, in their case, to India with their daughters. "Israelis love to travel," Stephen says. "In Canada, one can drive 1,000 miles to reach the Manitoba border. Here it takes less than two hours to get to the end of Highway Six [a new road connecting northern Israel with the centre of the country].

A highlight of the visit for Stephen and Alison was a trip to the Elijah Rock, thought to be the location of a visit from Elijah the Prophet, considered sacred by both Bene Israel Jews and local Hindus.

For newer olim, like Rachel and myself, with travel generally made impossible by young children, ulpan studies, or renting an apartment, we have to find our romance in less grand gestures, and sometimes, just in the wonder of being in this holy land in the first place.

"One of the things we do every anniversary," Rachel told me, "is we review the last year, how have we done, how we are as a couple. We look back at what we've been through and where we are now. This past year, we returned to Israel. We were married in Israel, had intense experiences in Israel… and now we've brought our family back home."

Definitely better than "we didn't kill each other." I look at my husband, across the table here on a Sunday morning workday in our tiny Haifa apartment, listening to the traffic and birds chirping outside, seeing the gently warm sunlight, and realize – we're home.

There's no candle in the middle of this table, no glatt kosher meal served by waiters, and soon enough, we'll have to go pick up our kids from school. But in the meantime, we don't need to go anywhere else or do anything else. We have given ourselves the ultimate anniversary present this year. After two millennia, there's nothing more romantic than coming home.

The delicate art of chupah music

Binyamin Kagedan sings under the chupah.

Binyamin Kagedan
JNS.org

The hall has been booked, the dress fitted, the flowers selected, the food tasted, the photographer approved, the bands auditioned, the rings engraved, and the honeymoon suite reserved. With all the material components of the wedding in place, the focus now turns to the intangibles. What makes a Jewish wedding truly moving and memorable is not what is seen, but what is heard. The emotional tone of the ceremony won't be set by the size of the bride's bouquet, but by a heartfelt blessing, a unique vow, or a special song.

That's where I come in.

A musician and singer by hobby, I have had the happy fortune of being asked to sing under the chupah at the weddings of most of my best friends, as well as close family members. The Jewish wedding ceremony is rich in opportunities for powerful emotional expression, especially in its music. Songs about holy love punctuate and enliven each step of the process: the groom's entrance, then the bride's; the last of the seven blessings; the breaking of the glass. The quality and combination of the tunes used for these moments lend each and every chupah a unique emotional texture.

I view my role in these weddings not just as cantor or entertainer, but as consultant. In order to create a "score" that channels the couple's individual personality, I provide them with a range of options for each musical moment, and give ideas and tips on how to fit the music into the complex choreography of their chupah.

Some couples like the more elegiac melodies, while others prefer a more cheerful ambience. Some include pop music in their ceremony, others keep to the traditional Hebrew verse. Certain brides want guitar accompaniment, others request pure voice or prefer that I sing with the band they hired. A few grooms will break the glass underfoot while I am still singing. "If I forget thee o Jerusalem," but most will wait until after the last note, letting the sound of the shattering signal the eruption of "Mazal Tov!" from the crowd.

Chupah music is an art, and like all good art, it comes together in the details. Attention to detail is essential to creating a seamless esthetic experience for the bride, groom, and assembled guests, and for my part, is a gesture of love and dedication toward the marrying couple. I begin rehearsing weeks before the event, nailing down the perfect tempo, finding the optimal key for my vocal range and making certain that I can comfortably hit the lowest and highest notes. When the specifics are set, I get in touch with the band leader to bring him or her up to speed. Come wedding day, I drag the keyboardist out of the smorgasbord to run through the set with me in person, just to be sure that nothing is left to chance.

There are few acts more gratifying than to enhance the sweetness of the wedding day for dear friends. I got to experience one of them recently, as I designed and performed (along with my new sister-in-law) the vocals for my own chupah. Singing to my glowing bride as she circled around me seven times, I felt as though all the time and care I had put into every previous chupah performance, all of the logistical and esthetic expertise I had accumulated, all of it was meant to prepare me for that moment, for her. And though the October weather was perfectly unseasonable, the hanging candles perfectly placed, and her dress perfectly tailored, it was the music that made the night so perfect.

SARS-delayed wedding has happy outcome

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

Andy Warhol predicted that everyone would be famous for 15 minutes. And for Michelle Markowitz, 36, and Brad Goldsmith, 37, their moment of fame came on Memorial Day weekend 10 years ago.

They had planned their Toronto wedding for that long weekend in May, to accommodate the many out-of-towners who were travelling from the United States. Goldsmith, a financial analyst, is from the Detroit area. While May 25 was a convenient date for many of the American guests, the timing turned out to be less than perfect: Toronto happened to be in the throes of the SARS epidemic.

By the time that weekend was over, the Markowitz-Goldsmith wedding made headlines worldwide. Their story was featured in dailies across North America and as far away as Great Britain. The couple was even interviewed on CNN and later they appeared on Canada AM.

Markowitz and Goldsmith met in 1996 at Camp Tamarack in Michigan, a Jewish communal camp serving the Detroit area. They carried on a long-distance relationship until Goldsmith proposed and moved to Toronto.

He recounted how many of his friends and family in the United States were apprehensive about coming to Toronto for the wedding because of the SARS epidemic, but the travel ban had been lifted by May. On the Thursday before the wedding some of the out-of-towners began to arrive.

Markowitz, who had recently graduated as an occupational therapist, had found a locum position at St. John's Rehabilitation Hospital. While Goldsmith was with his family downtown at the Sheraton Hotel, Markowitz says she got some devastating news. "They announced that there was an outbreak of SARS at St. John's."

Goldsmith says they were expecting 130 guests from out of town. "I was at the hotel handing out visitors' baskets – pre-wedding stuff – and then I got this call from my father-in-law. He said, 'You have to come home right away.'

"I didn't know what had happened, but I could hear Michelle crying in the background. My dad said I turned white. I told him, 'They're ordering me back to the house.'

"I had no clue what had happened... As I drove home, I wondered if someone had died. Or maybe it was the dress. Had I turned on the car radio I would have heard. The new outbreak of SARS was all over the news."

Brad Goldsmith and Michelle Markowitz

Markowitz says they weren't sure if the wedding had to be cancelled. Guests were still arriving, but the family had not yet heard from the hospital. "We didn't sleep all night.

"My father-in-law said, 'Let's keep it quiet'," recalls Goldsmith. "He didn't want to start any mass hysteria in the family. He didn't want people to panic."

But the family knew they didn't have a lot of time, he adds. "You can't wait until 3 p.m. to cancel a dinner at 6 p.m."

The next day, he accompanied Markowitz and her mother to the public health office. "My mother-in-law went into the office, and Michelle and I waited outside.

"When her mother came down from the meeting she handed Michelle the SARS mask. 'You're not allowed to be in public,' she told her. 'You have to go home. You're quarantined.'"

"It was very a traumatic event," says Markowitz.

"As she walked down the street wearing the mask people on the sidewalk parted from us like the Red Sea," said Goldsmith.

"My mother-in-law told us the wedding had to be cancelled. The two of them walked down the street together crying."

In the meantime there were many calls to be made, he said. "It's a lot of work to cancel a wedding. They made a telephone tree like we do on snow days at school."

There were some arrivals from the west coast, but one uncle was contacted in time to get off the plane while it was still on the tarmac.

Goldsmith says he is known to be quite a kibbitzer, and so when he called his friends about the cancellation, they thought he was joking.

"They didn't believe me until they heard Michelle crying in the background."

Everybody involved in the wedding was very sympathetic, says Markowitz. "The synagogue [Beth Sholom] was terrific. They told us to book another date right away so we would feel better."

The caterer charged them cost for the food as did the florist, and they were able to roll over other deposits for the new wedding day, which was set for the fall.

"We took the honeymoon we planned in Bora Bora, but it turned out to be the rainy season," Markowitz laughed.

Next month the couple will be celebrating their 10th anniversary. They are trying to plan a special getaway, but life is more complicated now that they are the parents of three young sons ages 6, 5 and 2. Markowitz has also switched professions. Today she's an optometrist.

Their November wedding was a great party, the couple say, but their SARS experience, which they call "Black Sunday" will always be part of their family lore. In fact, their wedding video begins with their CNN interview with Jason Caroll.

Goldsmith muses how months before the wedding a friend of his from New York had suggested that he buy wedding insurance. "When I told my father-in-law about it, he laughed. He said, 'Brad, are you planning to run away?'

"If I would have bought the insurance, I would have been quite the hero."

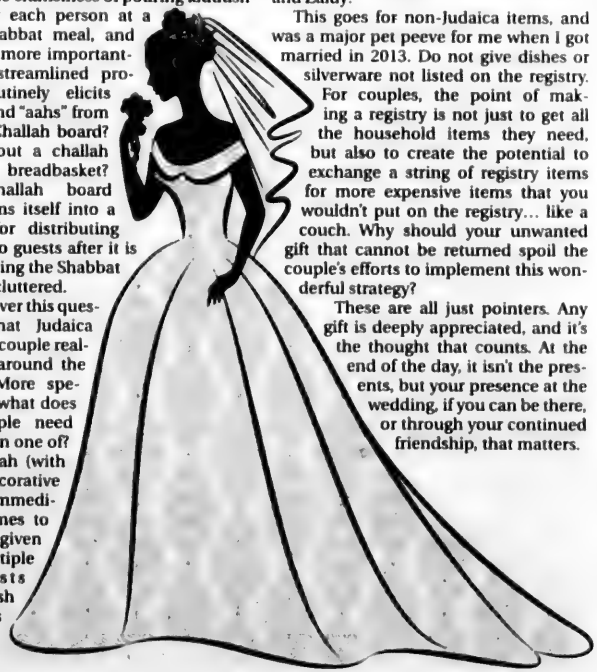
Gift etiquette for Jewish weddings

Jacob Kamaras
JNS.org

Not another challah board! That's the collective cry heard 'round the Jewish world when newlyweds receive a Judaica gift they already possess. Don't be that friend – follow my simple do's and don'ts for Jewish wedding gifts.

There are inventive spins on Judaica items that are sure to leave a more lasting impression than their traditional counterparts. Kiddush cup? How about a kiddush cup fountain instead? It includes a centre cup as well as eight to 12 matching small cups, and when the reciter of kiddush pours the wine from the centre cup into the base of the fountain, the wine trickles down into the small cups. This avoids the clumsiness of pouring kiddush wine for each person at a large Shabbat meal, and perhaps more importantly, the streamlined process routinely elicits "oohs" and "aahs" from guests. Challah board? How about a challah board breadbasket? This challah board transforms itself into a basket for distributing challah to guests after it is cut, keeping the Shabbat table uncluttered.

Mull over this question: What Judaica does the couple really need around the house? More specifically, what does the couple need more than one of? A mezuzah (with a decorative case) immediately comes to mind, given the multiple doorposts in Jewish homes calling for one.



Even more practical –and more memorable – is providing the glass cup that the groom will break with his foot under the chuppah, along with a broken wedding glass mezuzah, whose case includes room for those sentimental shards.

The couple will likely get multiple challah boards, challah covers, menorahs, seder plates, and the like. Don't join the fray. Be original. Now, I admit, it would be quite unfortunate if everyone followed my advice and the couple ended up with none of these hallowed Judaica fixtures.

The couple's parents or other close relatives may purchase them silver Shabbat candlesticks or a kiddush cup, or the bride and groom may have had these items passed down in their family over time. Don't try and compete with Bubbie and Zaidy!

This goes for non-Judaica items, and was a major pet peeve for me when I got married in 2013. Do not give dishes or silverware not listed on the registry. For couples, the point of making a registry is not just to get all the household items they need, but also to create the potential to exchange a string of registry items for more expensive items that you wouldn't put on the registry... like a couch. Why should your unwanted gift that cannot be returned spoil the couple's efforts to implement this wonderful strategy?

These are all just pointers. Any gift is deeply appreciated, and it's the thought that counts. At the end of the day, it isn't the presents, but your presence at the wedding, if you can be there, or through your continued friendship, that matters.

Gemologist elaborates on diamonds from here and abroad

Elaine Cohen
Supplements Co-ordinator

The sight of sparkling diamonds in a jeweller's showcase is bound to attract attention. However, to truly appreciate the finished product, it pays to learn about diamonds from the ground up, said gemologist, Odile Civitello.

Civitello conducted a PowerPoint presentation at one of the fall/winter lectures at the Cote St. Luc Eleanor London Public Library.

A certified appraiser with more than 20 years experience, Civitello is the founding director of the Montreal School of Gemology (École Gemmologie de Montréal).

She has written articles for gemology magazines and journals, and she is certified by the GIA, Gem-A, CGA, and CJA.

Civitello elaborated on the formation and transformation of diamonds, discussed diamond quality and criteria, and expounded on Canada's diamond mines. Diamonds are sold now with a quality lab report, she said.

"Diamonds are found much deeper [in the ground] than most gems," she said, providing background information on the their evolution and history.

She also showed slides of Canadian mines, such as Kimberlite Pipe in the Northwest Territories. Other Canadian diamond mines are located in Ontario, Quebec, Saskatchewan and Baffin Island.

Mine discovery is difficult and it took geologists 10 years of checking materials before finding the first Canadian diamond mine in 1998, she said.

Before attempting to exploit, a geologist must make sure the expedition is feasible. The value of a mine is based on the life span yield in karats of the rough diamond. Canadian diamonds rate third place in the world. Botswana is deemed in first place for gem quality and Russia comes second.

Civitello reviewed the cutting process and underlined the importance of precision to achieve brilliance. Conversely, she noted some consumers now lean toward rough diamonds. A diamond can mark any other stone.

There are not too many cutting factories in the world, she said, and most diamonds are cut in India. Sometimes highly skilled diamond cutters will carry out the operation from beginning to end.

Canada does have a few diamond cutters and they tend to cut bigger diamonds and special cuts, she said. Canadian cutting factories are located in Yellowknife, Vancouver and Sudbury.

The price of diamonds is based on the four Cs: cut, carat, colour, and clarity. Diamonds should be kept sparkling clean. Civitello suggested a simple solution. Immerse the diamond in a bowl of soapy water and let it sit overnight. Use a mild dish detergent. The next morning, take a toothbrush and lightly brush the stone under the setting, rinse and dry the stone.

Diamond engagement rings are always in vogue.

Dishes in your signature style

Anita Szabadi-Gottesman
Special to The CJN

We have come a long way from the days of yesteryear when the pewter mug, plate and spoon were used over and over again for every meal.

The Victorian age brought us to the standard place setting we see today. This includes a dinner plate, salad plate, bread plate and soup bowl. A cup and saucer or mug finish the ensemble.

All-white dinnerware remains a popular choice to setting a beautiful table.

The dinner plate measures approximately 10 inches, the salad plate ranges from four to eight inches, and the bread plate is slightly smaller. The soup bowl is the most versatile, suitable for soup, cereal, desserts and even salad, if preferred.

Whether for casual dining or more formal fair, the range of choices is at once dizzying and inspiring.

While the choices may seem overwhelming, one thing remains constant, purchasing a set of dishes, whether for everyday use or special occasions, should be a reflection of the style of the homeowner.

Choosing the type of material for the dishes is the way to begin. Evaluate your needs, and consider whether you are looking for microwave and freezer safe dishes and if they must be washed by hand or are dishwasher safe.

Bone china, an expensive choice, is made from a mixture of clay and bone ash making for durable dinnerware despite appearing slightly translucent.

Ceramic dishes are made from clay and are fired or baked providing versatility in colour and design.

Stoneware is a more durable choice, often chosen for everyday use. Stoneware is microwave safe, can withstand temperature changes, and is quite chip resistant.

Porcelain, the most expensive choice appears thin and transparent, but is very chip resistant.

Glass dishes are very decorative and dishwasher safe although they can be quite fragile. For the very busy household with lots of kitchen traffic, melamine or polycarbonate dishes may be ideal with the ubiquitous Corelle brand remaining the industry leader.

Mixing and matching various patterns and textures creates an individual signature look for the table. A plain white set can be dressed up or down for casual or more elegant entertaining combining interesting patterns or floral accents. Adding varying shapes creates interest such as mixing a square soup bowl with a round dinner plate. Dressing up your table adds to the ambience and welcoming feel of a meal.

Mixing and matching different colours and shapes adds interest and creates a signature style for your table.

[Anita Szabadi-Gottesman photos]

Start with a set of 12 place settings. Popular priced dinnerware is most often sold in sets of four. When purchasing a more expensive set, pieces can be collected individually over a longer period of time but make sure the manufacturer will continue to produce the dinnerware. If buying from an outlet store, complete the purchase all at once. Serving sets including salad servers, serving spoons and the like are a nice addition along with large serving plates. Purchase at least one pitcher to complete the set.

To keep your dishes looking their best and to minimize wear and tear, Martha Stewart points to the correct way of stacking the dishwasher:

Heavy duty dishes should be placed on the bottom rack and delicate dishes on the upper rack. Dry dishes on the lowest temperature setting, and always use the recommended amount of detergent. Too much can leave dishes streaky, and too little can result in unclean dishes.

Coffee makers serve as great gifts for newlyweds

Elaine Cohen
Supplements Co-ordinator

Coffee makers always make a good gift, whether or not the bride and groom drink the beverage.

As hosts, the couple will encounter numerous occasions when their family and friends appreciate the opportunity to socialize over a cup of coffee.

According to the Coffee Association of Canada, coffee is the preferred adult beverage in this country. The only exception is tap water.

A 2012 association survey indicates 65 per cent of adults consume coffee daily. The bulk of consumption takes place in people's homes, and Canadians drink 2.6 cups of coffee daily.

Although traditional manual percolators and drip makers, which are placed on an oven burner, still exist, they are no longer the norm. More than two decades ago, they were replaced by automatic, self-contained multi-cup coffee makers.

In recent years, single-serve pod coffee makers surpassed expectations and now take the lead. Pod coffee makers and accessories are accessible in supermarkets and online throughout the nation.

"In the old days, many commuters lacked time to linger over the stove every morning to oversee coffee preparation, dispose grains and clean up," says kitchenware guru Linda Feldman.

Before retiring several years ago, Feldman devoted more than two decades to managing the houseware section in a department store. An astute consumer, she continues to keep abreast of recent trends.

"Personally, I've witnessed a change of routine in many young households over the past few years. Couples tell me how they used to make a pit stop for coffee on the way to work. No doubt, many still do, but others have discovered the simplicity and convenience of owning single-serve pod coffee makers. It takes a minute to prepare a fresh cup of steaming coffee. Now, they can head straight to work and save money."

In addition to the pod devices, kitchenware departments stock numerous diverse multi-cup coffee makers. Consumers can produce fresh, piping hot dependable brews.

Single-serve coffee makers use pods, discs, cups or cartridges as primary at-home preparation devices. The number of homes equipped with newly acquired single-serve devices rose from six per cent in 2010 to 15 per cent by the end of 2012.

Attitudes bode well for future success of the pod format according to recent Canadian Consumer Reports. Single-serve is hailed for providing a quick, convenient and easy fix. On the down side, critics report the brew, though acceptable, is mediocre even when incorporating Colombian or comparable coffee.

Three DeLonghi models topped tests in a recent Consumer Report evaluation. In addition, a Nescafe Dolce Gusto Genco model edged out two other picks from the same brand. The evaluation took note of LED bars, and remarked on the brew strength and the prompt that indicates water is hot. New coffeemakers often need a break-in cycle, and some need a water-only cycle before brewing coffee the first time. Some machines work with a limited menu of coffees exclusively from a brand, whereas others are compatible with some 250 coffees from multiple brands.

Consumers are advised to examine the device to see if the water reservoir can be detached and brought to the sink for fill up. Check to see if the device is fitted with a drip tray to adjust cup height and a built-in water filter. Coffee production speed is important for couples running out to work. One minute for the first cup and not quite a minute for the second cup is a time saver. Temperature is important. The goal is to serve and savour a steaming hot brew.

Multi-cup coffee makers – drip, percolator or other devices, are preferable for serving a small group. Furthermore, couples who want more control over the brew strength and opt for two giant-size mugs each at a sitting may find the multi-maker more convenient.

Using a grinder to chop the beans is a coffee connoisseur's method of choice. When checking out grinders, consumers will discover some are manufactured with rotating wheels and others with blades. Both do the job. To eliminate grinding the beans, purchase packaged ground coffee.

Storing coffee is a debatable point. Numerous experts insist on keeping packaged beans or ground coffee in the freezer, whereas others simply put packages in the fridge or pantry. To ensure coffee tastes good, serve it fresh. Dispose of grains or pods immediately. Keep the coffee maker clean.

Try different blends. Darker roasts have been cooked longer and have a stronger taste than the lighter, milder varieties. A coffee blend is a combination of roasts/beans designed to give a more complex flavour. By exploring different blends, individuals will gradually find a particular favourite. For those who seek variety, check the shelves for seasoned blends, such as vanilla, amaretto, mocha, caramel, Brazil nut and chocolate.

Airport layover leads to marriage

Elaine Cohen
Supplements Co-ordinator

Few travellers have happy memories of flight delays but Jessica "Jess" Meryl Black and Matthew "Matt" David Isaac Weinstock are the exception.

Although they were both in their 20s and had always resided in Saint-Laurent, neither was aware of the other's existence until they met at Toronto's Pearson International Airport on Dec. 17, 2007. Both had signed up for the Taglit-Birthright Israel 10-day trip.

Jess was immediately attracted to Matt. "I thought he was smart and personable," she says, adding, "I fell in love right away but I could sense he needed more time. Our relationship developed in Israel and we spent a lot of time together. We like to laugh and Matt has a dry sense of humour. We have always found lots to talk about."

Matt said, "I admired her intelligence and personality, especially the way she challenged me, but even though I found her attractive, I wasn't even thinking about settling down or marriage. We saw each other and remained friends but I was happy just going out. It wasn't until later that I realized Jess is the only one for me."

They not only share the same principles but encourage each other to pursue their respective ambitions. Matt was in engineering at Concordia University when he decided to change direction and become a pilot.

He currently holds a full-time job as a technical co-ordinator at Shaw-Direct and simultaneously continues working toward his pilot's licence.

Jess, a Concordia University graduate, majored in business administration. She loves her challenging full-time post as project manager at Zed Graphic Communications. In addition, Jess turned her fascination with cruise vacations into a sideline as an outside travel agent for cruises.

"I consider it a hobby and we chose a cruise for our honeymoon," she says. They took a three-week Mediterranean cruise and describe it as an awesome experience.

Despite busy work schedules, they always make time for each other. In addition, family and friends play an integral role in their lives.

Jess's mother and father, Serena and Jerome Black, and Matt's parents, Anne and Morris Weinstock, reside in Saint-Laurent.

Jess is close with her younger sister, Alex, who is currently pursuing her master's degree in nursing.

Earlier in their relationship, Matt and Jess bought a condominium in Saint-Laurent. They adopted two kittens, Milo and Purr, which have become treasured family members.

"Our personalities complement one another," Matt said. "Jess is extremely pro-active, whereas I am more laid back. That's good because she encourages me to strive for more."

Jess said, "Matt is always calm, whereas I am more high strung and always planning projects. He has a calming effect. We're strong believers in the importance of face-to-face communication and don't depend on texting, when we have something important to discuss. A couple must protect their relationship beyond all else."

Matt surprised Jess with a marriage proposal and diamond ring a year before the wedding. She was completely unaware of his elaborate plans and dazzled by his dramatic presentation.

"The only time I ever saw him nervous was when he proposed," she says.

"My parents and sister were in on the act. When we arrived for the weekend at my family's country home, I was greeted with hundreds of twinkling lights, Beyonce belting out Halo, and a ring."

On Sept. 1, Rabbi Alan Bright, spiritual leader of Congregation Shaare Zedek, officiated at Matt and Jess's wedding. The couple was married at Chateau Vaudreuil.

"We met with Rabbi Bright several times beforehand, and Matt was delighted to discover the rabbi was an accomplished pilot. He flew with Matt a couple of times before the wedding and complimented Matt's progress."

Jess is detail oriented and Matt likes to be involved, therefore, they put a lot of work into their wedding preparations.

"We personalized everything including kippas, [and had] an Appy Couple wedding app, a telephone charging station at the wedding, and flip flops for the dance floor," Jess said.

"We invited a lot of non-Jewish guests and Rabbi Bright enlightened everyone on Jewish traditions. We even printed a program book with a glossary of Jewish terms."

The couple also wanted to take advantage of Chateau Vaudreuil's outdoor amenities and grounds, so they were concerned about the weather. Fortunately, it turned out to be a beautiful weekend and everything went according to plan.

Now, Jess and Matt are in the throes of moving into a new home. A warm, gregarious couple, they value the location close to their families in Saint-Laurent. "We usually go to the family for holiday dinners but in the future we hope to host and entertain," Jess says.

Stuffed vegetables: serving bowls are edible

Beverly Levitt
Special to The CJN

As every great chef will tell you, presentation is everything. So for a wedding shower I try to create recipes where we can keep our vegetables whole and utilize the bounty of live vessels from the garden rather than prosaic ceramic containers off the kitchen shelf.

What's more beautiful than taking a gorgeous striated kabocha, scooping out the centre, and piling back complimentary ingredients? A new and nourishing relationship is born.

What really warms my heart is when the host vegetable insists on a dramatic filling – the outside challenges the inside – in a yin-yang, sort of way. Just as a carved-out portabello mushroom container plays host to the Italian Parmigiano-Reggiano cheese, kalamata olives, and flat leafed parsley, and a feisty corn kernel/red pepper mélange of black cumin, pumpkin and sesame seeds snuggles in a bright green and yellow striated kabocha; while toasted pine nuts, currants, and almonds nestle happily inside an ambrosial Vidalia onion.

Flavour synergies are restrained only by our imagination. And isn't that a wondrous lesson to teach a new bride so that she can teach her children and her children can teach their children? L'Dorvador…l'dorvador! (From generation to generation)

STUFFED ZUCCHINI

(Adapted from La Vera Cucina by Carlo Middione, Simon & Schuster, 1996)

1/4 oz. dried porcini mushrooms
3 large zucchini, about 6 in. long and 1 1/2 in. in diameter
1/2 cup grated Parmesan
1/2 cup fresh bread crumbs
1 large egg, beaten
1 to 2 teaspoons olive oil
salt and freshly ground pepper to taste
4 fresh basil leaves, finely chopped
extra olive oil as needed

Soak porcini in warm water for 15 minutes so they float at least 1 in. off of the bottom of the container. Scoop them off surface of water, squeeze well, chop fine. Strain through paper towel. (Water may be saved to use in stocks.)

Preheat oven to 400.

Simmer whole zucchini in lightly salted water for 5 minutes. Remove; cool in bowl of cold water. Split in half lengthwise, leaving stem attached. Scoop out pulp but leave enough thickness on sides and bottom to support stuffing. Chop pulp; add chopped porcini, 1/4 cup Parmesan, and remaining ingredients. Mix well.

Stuff zucchini with mixture, mounding it up, place in lightly oiled, ovenproof dish. Sprinkle with remaining cheese; bake for 30 minutes or until tops are golden and bubbly. Serve hot.

SWEET ONIONS STUFFED WITH PINE NUTS AND CURRANTS

(Adapted from La Vera Cucina by Carlo Middione, Simon & Schuster)

6 medium Vidalia or other sweet summer onion
4 tbsp. unsalted butter or olive oil, or less if desired
1/2 cup freshly grated Parmigiano-Reggiano cheese
1/4 cup pine nuts
1/4 cup currants
1 large egg
pinch of cinnamon
small amount of freshly ground black pepper

Preheat oven to 350. Carefully cut tops off onions, about 1/4 in. Peel onions carefully so only membrane is removed, leaving root end intact. Using a melon baller, carefully remove hearts of onions, leaving 1/2 in. shell, so that onion looks like a basket. Rub onion shells, inside and out with butter, put aside.

Chop hearts; place them into a small bowl. Add cheese, pine nuts and currants, half of the butter or oil and mix well.

In another dish beat together egg, cinnamon, and pepper. Combine with onion mixture and stuff into the onions.

Grease a small casserole, place onions in it, barely touching each other. Dot tops with butter or oil. Bake 45 minutes, or until onions are soft but not falling apart. Serve hot or at room temperature.

Sprucing up the modern simchah

Diana Burmistrovich
JNS.org

If the words kosher catering conjure up visions of bland and unhealthy food, and memories of bar and bat mitzvahs past still haunt you, remember that planning your upcoming simchah doesn't have to be a monotonous process full of seen-it-befores or tried-that-onces. With the help of creative kosher catering professionals – or by simply looking within yourself – your special day can be one of a kind.

By including yourself in the process of creating (not just planning) your simchah, the event itself automatically creates a more personal feeling. One way to do this is by making invitations by hand, which allows control over colour scheme, font, and design. You can make the invitation an extension of your celebration's theme or personal interests. Imbuing the invitation with your personal style makes the atmosphere both more memorable and more meaningful.

Rebecca Friedman of Asheville, N.C.-based Farmer's Daughter Catering suggests crafting your own table centrepieces as a way to infuse personality into the event's ambiance. She also mentions that many clients want to work with the party planner, rather than allowing the planner to have total control.

Others may break from the traditional style of first having a cocktail hour and then a formal dinner for weddings, or from having separate meals for adults and kids.

"When working with a client, I always ask them what they're envisioning with regards to the flow of the celebration," Ellen Vaknine, vice-president of sales and marketing for New York City's Espirit Events kosher caterer, tells JNS.org. .

STUFFED EGGPLANT ITALIAN STYLE

1 large or 2 medium eggplants
1 sweet onion, chopped
2 large cloves garlic, minced
1/2 cup red pepper, chopped
1/2 cup yellow pepper, chopped
Olive oil for sautéing
1/4 cup freshly squeezed lemon juice
1 tbsp. fresh chopped basil or 1 teaspoon dried
1 tbsp. fresh chopped oregano or 1 teaspoon dried
1/2 cup black olives, sliced (optional)
1 cup mozzarella cheese, grated
1/2 cup fine, dry bread crumbs
2 eggs, slightly beaten
1/2 tsp. paprika
salt and pepper to taste
1/4 cup Parmesan cheese, grated (optional)

Halve and parboil eggplant 15 minutes. Drain. Scoop out meat carefully, so that eggplant shells remain intact.

Chop eggplant and sauté in olive oil with onion, garlic and peppers for 5-7 minutes, hashing them as they cook.

Place in bowl; mix with lemon juice, basil, oregano, olives, cheese, eggs, bread crumbs, and spices. Stuff eggplant shells, dust with Parmesan.

Place in baking dish with an inch of hot water at bottom. Bake at 350 for 30 to 40 minutes or until stuffing is tender.

STUFFED PORTOBELLO MUSHROOMS

(Adapted from Antipasti by Julia Della Croce, Chronicle Books, 1993)

6 large portobello mushrooms, cleaned
1 tbsp. dried bread crumbs
6 pitted kalamata olives, chopped (optional)
1 1/2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
2 tbsp. freshly grated Parmigiano-Reggiano cheese
1 tbsp. fresh Italian parsley, chopped
1 tsp. fresh or 1/2 teaspoon dried rosemary, chopped
1 tsp. fresh or 1/2 tsp. fresh sage, chopped
1 clove garlic, peeled and finely chopped
salt and freshly ground pepper to taste
1 to 2 tbsp.red wine, or as needed

Preheat oven to 400. In small bowl, remove stems and chop. Combine with all stuffing ingredients, making sure you have enough wine to keep it moist. Place mushrooms in baking dish in single layer, rub lightly with olive oil. Stuff caps, patting each into an evenly rounded mound. Sprinkle lightly with water. Pour hot water in bottom of baking dish to equal 1/2 in. Cover loosely with foil, dull side out. Bake 20 to 30 minutes until mushrooms are sizzling hot.

Kids' food at simchahs can be gourmet

Vaknine notes that for simchahs being planned for 2014, she is seeing more people "opt for the extended cocktail [hour] with passed hors d'oeuvres and stations," without having a formal sit-down dinner. That way, children, young adults, and adults have the option of spending more time together, and kids don't have to face the ubiquitous schnitzel and pigs-in-a-blanket offered at so many simchahs.

Even for the parents who do choose to have "kid food," Vaknine suggests updating the presentation with funky touches. Soup can be served in eggshell bowls, and kebob skewers can be made from bamboo.

Customizing menus to include today's culinary trends is another way to modernize an event. Friedman – who specializes in catering using only organic and local ingredients, and typically provides farm-to-table food options – notes the growing trend in using vegan, gluten-free, soy-free, and dairy-free foods as part of the simchah menu.

"Although kosher food is usually unhealthy, it is slowly getting on board with foods that are more environmentally friendly and healthier," says Friedman. "I've had a bride who grew her own herbs and greens to incorporate into my catering menu. It took a year in advance [to plan], but everyone remembered that part."

Friedman suggests looking into old family recipes that can be used as part of the catering menu. That will create a catering menu that many guests haven't seen before, and relatives will enjoy the sentiment.

Whether it is through personalizing decorations or bypassing traditional kosher fare, party planning doesn't have to be dreaded and stressful. With just a little bit of creativity, and by recognizing exactly what you want for your special day, you can make your dream simchah a reality.

A large bronze statue of Franz Kafka sits in a small plaza on Dusni Street just a short walk from the old town square of Prague. The statue looms over its many admirers and serves as a welcoming ambassador to the historic Jewish Quarter of Prague.

Appropriately located near Kafka's home, the tall black sculpture measuring over 12 feet, straddles the entrance to the fascinating Jewish quarter of modern day Prague. Regarded by many as one of the most influential authors of the 20th century through his existential writings, Kafka, a Jew, is honoured a few short steps from his home, from which he authored his many books and short stories.

Six synagogues and the Jewish Town Hall make up the Jewish Quarter or ghetto area. Just behind the statue sits the Spanish Synagogue majestic in its Moorish design, which was completed in the late 19th century. Classical concerts are held in the synagogue known for its beauty and favourable acoustics.

Nearby, the Old-New Synagogue (Altneu Shul), dating from approximately 1280, is the oldest preserved synagogue in central QEurope. The synagogue, with its original furnishings and intricate exterior stonework, is used today for services as well as bar and bat mitzvahs and other simchahs by Prague's Jewish population, numbering approximately 5,000, which includes about 2,000 Israelis.

Tourists flock to the Jewish Quarter of Prague to visit the well-preserved historical Jewish sites.

The Maisel Synagogue, no longer in use, shows a detailed history of the Jews from the region from the communities' founding in the 10th century through to the 18th century. The Pinkas Synagogue, which dates from 1535, serves as a memorial to the Czech Jews who perished in the Holocaust. The walls are inscribed with their names, numbering more than 80,000 people.

Ironically, the scope of Jewish life which has been preserved in Prague stemmed from Adolf Hitler, who chose to keep the artifacts and synagogues along with several buildings intact throughout the war as a legacy to the Jewish race he attempted to destroy. Many other Jewish valuables from various occupied countries were brought to Prague, and are on display in the Klausen Synagogue, Ceremonial Hall and the Robert Guttman Gallery.

The solemn sounds of prayer resound daily from individuals surrounding the tomb of revered Rabbi Judah Loew who died in 1609. Each day, Jews from around the world come to pay their respects and pray graveside. He is most famous for bringing the legend of the Golem to life. The mysterious Golem was said to come out at nightfall and protect the Jews of Prague of the time. Rabbi Loew was laid to rest in the Old Jewish Cemetery, the oldest Jewish cemetery in Europe.

As Jews lived in the ghetto area for generations, there are thought to be more than 150,000 Jews buried in the small graveyard. Headstones of various generations stand intertwined as graves were piled one on top of the other 10 to 12 layers deep. The oldest grave in the cemetery is thought to belong to Rabbi Avigdor Kara, an influential Prague rabbi in the late 14th century.

Today's Jewish quarter has seen a complete facelift where not far from the historic synagogue area are beautifully appointed apartment buildings along tree covered avenues built in Parisian style. Upscale retailers such as Prada and Breitling, amongst rows of others, line the streets where upscale shoppers rub elbows with tourists flocking to see the Jewish sites nearby.

Keeping kosher is not a problem as there are several kosher restaurants in the area. The strictly glatt kosher Dinitz restaurant is run by a team of young Israelis. The familiar menu of Mediterranean treats, and the warm atmosphere add to the Prague Jewish experience. There are several four- and five- star hotels in the district where some kosher services are available. A great option is a kosher apartment with a kitchen or kitchenette.

Couple treasures 56 years of marital harmony

Elaine Cohen

In 1941, Steve Acre, born as Sabih Ezra Akerib, a nine-year-old Iraqi Jew, witnessed a Farhud attack that culminated in the massacre of Jewish people and pillage of homes. While Steve shuddered in horror from his perch atop a date tree, his mother and siblings cowered in the house.

Steve's father, Ezra Akerib, had died in 1938, leaving Steve's mother, Shafika Kattan, a widow with nine children to support and defend the family from Arab pro-Nazi predators.

Meanwhile, 5,756 miles away, Leila Dawn Azoulay, also nine in 1941, had heard tales at Talmud Torah School and at home about Nazi-initiated atrocities in other corners of the globe. Fortunately, Leila, the eldest of three children, growing up in Montreal led a comfortable life nurtured by her father, Dr. Leon Azoulay, a surgeon, and her mother, Anna Fay (nee Klein) Azoulay. Leila earned degrees at Sir George Williams (predecessor of Concordia University) and the University of Toronto.

Although Leila and Steve's childhood habitats and circumstances differed, they discovered common links when they met in 1957. In addition to being the same age, the couple shared pride in their Sephardi heritage and significant connections to Israel. Many decades earlier, Leila's father had emigrated from Jerusalem to Montreal. He began his medical studies at Laval University but later switched to University of Manitoba and attained his degree in 1914. Imbued with a love for the Holy Land, Leila spent a year in Israel after she graduated from university in the 1950s.

As for Steve, after escaping from Iraq in October 1949 with a two-month stopover in Iran, he finally found refuge in Israel. "In April 1950, I was called up," Steve says, recapping his military duty. "Then it was two years, and now it is three, but I served four."

In 1957, he ended up travelling across North America, where he visited Jewish agencies at every stopover. That is how the couple met in Vancouver.

"I was working with the Jewish agency in Vancouver because they needed a social worker to take care of the influx of Hungarian Jews in 1957," Leila said. The Jewish community was sparse then but the government relied on Jewish agencies to support the heavy influx of Hungarian Jewry.

Steve remembers chatting with the director when Leila entered the room. They were introduced and shortly after, Leila invited him to attend a movie with her and a friend. Within two weeks, Leila and Steve fell in love.

Seated in their cozy kitchen in Cote St. Luc, the couple recalls the highlights of their courtship and marriage. "I remembering phoning my parents in Montreal to announce I was coming home to get married," Leila reminisced.

After their wedding on Sept. 9, 1957, the bride and groom honeymooned in the Laurentian Mountains. "I was due back in Israel but plans changed after Leila [had an accident,"] Steve said. "Neither of us had ever gone horseback riding, so we had decided to try it. Leila was thrown off the horse, broke her back and landed in the hospital."

Steve was unable to return to Israel. He had Leila to look after and bills to pay (pre-Medicare). Hence, he sought permanent employment in Montreal.

An outgoing individual, Steve is conversant in English, French, Hebrew and Arabic. Initially, he opted for real estate but ultimately found insurance more appealing. Through personal experience, he felt strongly about the latter. "If my father had been insured, our family in Iraq would have been better off," he laments. At one time, Steve's father had been a wealthy exporter in Iraq, but after a warehouse fire, the family's finances were depleted.

"I have been in the insurance field for 52 years and still work five days a week," said Steve, 81, "but now I am an independent. I sold my business after a heart bypass in 1991."

While their three children were growing up, Leila and Steve owned a home in Dollard des Ormeaux. They have always played an active role in the Jewish and secular communities. Among his many volunteer pursuits, Steve was a prime mover behind the formation of West Island B'nai Brith Lodge. "We used to take psychiatric patients from the Lakeshore Hospital bowling every week," he says, "and we also organized cars to take patients to Expo 67." In addition, Steve coached soccer for 10- and 11-year-olds.

Married 56 years, Leila and Steve are proud parents of their children and eight grandchildren. Their son Danny resides in Ontario; daughter Amira is a concert pianist in Massachusetts; and youngest daughter, Yael, is a physician in Montreal.

"Yael's family joins us for Shabbat," says Leila, who bakes her own challah.

Determined not to let cardiac conditions impede their productivity, they follow fitness programs. Leila also takes courses at Cummings Centre. They both enjoy movies, theatre, ballroom and Israeli dancing.

The couple believes willingness to compromise plus a good sense of humour enhance a relationship. "My husband is more involved in politics than me but I follow his interests. In turn, I like opera, so he became interested."

Steve said, "our personalities also complement one another. I tend to worry about things but Leila is an optimist."

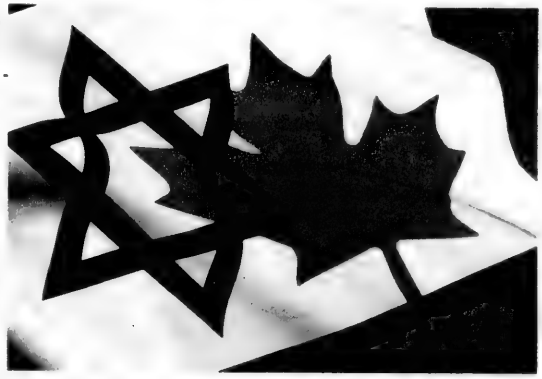
Israelis living in the Diaspora: Like the desert generation



Sara Dobner
Special to The CJN

"They are all orphans. They have cut themselves off from their roots and have turned their backs on their parents… Godless, parentless and homeless… Having lost one civilization, they had to construct another… We have distanced ourselves from our previous identity. Overnight we were uprooted from the rich soil of our parents' culture that was rich with thousands of years of history."

As I read Ari Shavit's new thought-provoking book, My Promised Land, and his vivid description of the settlers who came to Israel in the 1920s '30s, '40s and '50s, I could not help drawing parallels between these settlers and us, secular Israelis who live abroad.

Opinion

I do not suggest that the passion and sense of purpose that characterized the newcomers to Israel are equivalent to those of Israelis living outside Israel, but there are some analogies one can draw. The main difference is, however, that while the settlers to mid 20th-century Israel eagerly adopted a new, meaningful identity, many Israelis abroad have found themselves in a "no-man's identity land."

Secular Israelis generally feel little connection to God, religion, Jewish culture or heritage. We exhibit a lack of interest in anything that reminds us of the miserable Golah (Diaspora), and focus instead on our modern Israeli culture.

And now, in the Diaspora, somewhat like the settlers who came to Israel, we are orphans, godless, parentless and homeless. Like them, we are faced with the identity dilemma between the Israeli (secular) mentality – which has turned its back on thousands of years of rich Jewish heritage, culture, wisdom, spirituality and community life – and the opportunity to adopt a new Diaspora mentality and culture. But, unlike the new settlers to Israel who embraced their new Israeli identity enthusiastically, Israelis who wish to acquire a new Jewish identity in the Diaspora often face some challenges.

In many cases, secular Israelis have lost touch with the treasures of Judaism. We have forgotten where we came from and the reason why our ancestors took part in the 2,500-year journey in the Diaspora before our parents and grandparents arrived in Israel.

In Israel too, there is growing recognition of this ignorance and disconnect from Judaism. A new Be'eri Program, run by Jerusalem's Shalom Hartman Institute, in partnership with the Israeli Ministry of Education, is being introduced in 125 secular middle schools and high schools across Israel to teach teens Jewish values, social justice, identity, knowledge and tradition, demonstrating how all of this Jewishness fits naturally into modern daily life.

Israelis who have decided to relocate to the Diaspora are gradually coming to the realization that they may need to become part of the Jewish Diaspora – the one that their parents and grandparents had turned their back on, that many despised – so that they can regain a sense of identity.

Foster parent of ex-Lev Tahor kids speaks out

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — When Eluzor and Vita Moscowicz welcomed five young foster children into their home about six months ago, they were shocked by their appearance and demeanour.

The kids, ranging from infancy to seven years old, had been entrusted to them by Quebec's youth protection officials after they were removed from the controversial Lev Tahor chassidic sect, then based in Ste-Agathe des Monts, Que.

Eluzor Moscowicz said the children were not clean and wore shoes that were so ill-fitting that they were not walking normally.

Even the toddler girls were attired from head to toe in the black chador-like cloaks and kerchiefs that all female members of the sect are required to wear.

Disturbing as well was their suspicion and timidity, even about taking a shower or using soap that might have a scent, and the boys' fear that their heads would be shaved with a straight razor, as was the custom each Friday among the Lev Tahor.

Moscowicz was struck by the children's habit of talking against one another, behaviour that he persuaded them was not right, reassuring them they were all now loved and safe.

His wife sent written testimony about the children to a Knesset committee, which has been hearing from Israeli relatives of Lev Tahor members who are worried about what is going on within the group.

Allegations against it include forced underage marriage, failure to provide adequate education and inappropriate discipline of children using force

Moscowicz said in an interview that the foster children's father ran afoul of Lev Tahor chief leader, Rabbi Shlomo Helbrans, when his unhappiness with the sect became apparent. He made plans to leave and bring his family with him.

Rabbi Helbrans had already split up the family, placing the children among other families in the community because he felt they were not being brought up according to his notions of proper Jewish practice.

Moscowicz said the authorities got involved after Lev Tahor leaders called in the police, claiming the father was acting violently, including abusing his kids.

Forgery Alleged

MONTREAL — Canada gave a new passport to a Mossad agent who took part in the 2010 killing of a Hamas military leader in Dubai, an Iranian-Canadian businessman alleges. Arian Anzbar told Postmedia that Passport Canada national security officer Trina Kennedy revealed the information during their 1-1/2-year-long affair that began in 2012. As part of an RCMP-led task force, Kennedy had been assigned to investigate Anzbar's suspected espionage activities. Mahmoud al-Mahbouh was killed in a Dubai hotel in 2010. Dubai police later said a 26-person Mossad hit team carried out the killing, which Israel denies. Citizenship Minister Chris Alexander has reportedly called in police to investigate and ordered a probe at Passport Canada.

WORLD

Books Vandalized

TOKYO — More than 100 copies of Anne Frank's iconic Holocaust memoir Diary of a Young Girl have been vandalized in public libraries in Tokyo. Pages have been ripped from at least 265 copies of the diary and related books, Japanese officials said last week. It's not clear who's perpetrating the vandalism or why. The head of Japan's library council told AFP that five of Tokyo's wards had reported the vandalism so far. In terms of absolute numbers of diary copies sold, Japan is reportedly second only to the United States, and 30,000 Japanese tourists visit Anne Frank House in Amsterdam annually.

Vassar Hillel 'Open'

NEW YORK — Vassar College's Jewish Union declared itself an "Open Hillel" last week, repudiating international Hillel guidelines rejecting partnerships with groups deemed hostile toward Israel. The Vassar Jewish Union, a Hillel-affiliated student group, is the second campus Hillel organization to designate itself an Open Hillel. Swarthmore College Hillel voted to reject the international guidelines for campus Israel activities in December. The rules forbid individual Hillel chapters from hosting groups or speakers that among other things deny Israel's right to exist or support boycott or divestment from the Jewish state. "We believe that this policy censors and delegitimizes the diverse range of personal and political opinions held by Jewish students," the Vassar Jewish Union stated.

Council To Examine Muslim Condo Plan

TORONTO — Vaughan city council has set up a working group to address concerns about a controversial Muslim condominium complex in Thornhill Woods, a predominantly Jewish suburb.

Alan Shefman

The development came after a public hearing earlier this month that drew hundreds of people, many of whom opposed plans by the Islamic Shia Ithna Asheri Jamaat to build subsidized housing in the form of two 17-storey towers, 61 townhouses as well as assisted-living facilities for seniors on its 30-acre property adjacent to the Jaffari Centre mosque at 9000 Bathurst St., south of Rutherford Road.

The Association to Preserve Thornhill Woods, an organization founded by local residents to protest the development, says the project would have a negative impact on the infrastructure of the low-density suburb.

The working group, made up of ward and regional councillors, city staff, and members of the Thornhill Woods community, is expected to report back to city council with its recommendations in about five months.

"What's going to happen, I would hope, out of this [working group] will be some further insights, information, perhaps even some significant changes that would be made to the application that would come from the agreed-upon results of this group's deliberations," Vaughan Coun. Alan Shefman told the Vaughan Citizen.

Proposed citizenship reforms raise concerns

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

Many Jewish officials have turned thumbs down to the federal government's proposed sweeping reforms to the Citizenship Act.

Critics say the changes will erect roadblocks to citizenship for those who need protection, and could pose an abuse of power by the government.

In what Ottawa called "the first comprehensive reform to the Citizenship Act in more than a generation," Bill C-24 is intended to crack down on fraud and weed out those convicted of terrorism, treason or spying.

If passed, it would require would-be citizens to live in Canada longer before applying for citizenship, while permanent residents applying for citizenship would have to live in Canada for four of the last six years, instead of the current three years out of four.

"Citizenship is not a right, it is a privilege," Citizenship and Immigration Minister Chris Alexander said in introducing the measures.

Among other provisions, the bill would:

• No longer count time spent as a non-permanent resident (such as students or workers) toward the residency requirements for citizenship;

• Require citizenship applicants to declare their intent to reside in Canada;

• Expand the age for applicants required to demonstrate language proficiency and take a test to age 14 to 64, up from the current 18 to 54;

• Increase application fees for each adult to $300 from $100;

• Reduce access to courts. Under the new proposal, a person whose citizenship is revoked will have to apply to the Federal Court for permission to appeal. Currently, appealing revocation is an automatic right.

• Grant the minister powers to revoke citizenship. Currently, citizenship can only be removed by a judge.

Chris Alexander

Guidy Mamann, a Toronto immigration lawyer and board member of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) is bothered most by the bill's language requirement.

"It will affect people who come here under the family class, who have come later in life and find learning a new language a tremendous challenge," Mamann told The CJN. "Typically, [for] those who come as a sponsored parent or refugee in their 40s or 50s, it's going to be very difficult to learn a new language."

He's also sour on the bill's residency requirements.

"The quality of your contribution is not what is important to this government. It's the number of days you have your feet on Canadian soil," he said. "There should be a provision to grant citizenship to people who have been permanent residents for four years and who have made a significant contribution to the Canadian economy or cultural or artistic life, and who do not otherwise speak the language."

If passed in current form, the changes are "clearly going to put full participation in our Canadian way of life out of reach for many immigrants," Mamann said.

Ken Rosenberg, chair of the recently formed Jewish Refugee Action Network (JRAN) said his group's focus is refugee matters, not citizenship.

SACRED TRADITIONS

When someone in your family passes away, you want everything to be done right, according to Jewish tradition. When my mother died, I didn't know half of what these things were. Benjamin's spent time with our family, explaining the significance of every sacred ritual. More than that, they made it ours. It was a beautiful way to honour my dear mother's life.

Confusion reigns as Iran nuclear talks restart

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Could coverage of the Iran nuclear story be any more confused than what we witnessed when the opening round of P5+1 "comprehensive" talks with Iran were held last week in Vienna?

The comprehensive talks about Iran's nuclear program are intended to reach an agreement within six months, but, if necessary, can be extended for another six months.

Part of the confusion in the coverage stems from the fact that the two sides don't even agree about what's at issue. The P5+1 (the permanent members of the United Nations Security Council and Germany) want to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons, while Iran insists that it has no such goal – that it's merely aiming to develop a peaceful civilian nuclear program.

Succumbing to international sanctions imposed on its oil and financial sectors, Iran agreed last November, as part of an "interim" plan, to temporarily scale back its nuclear activities in exchange for limited sanctions relief. Taking effect Jan. 20, the interim agreement requires Iran to stop production of 20 per cent enriched uranium but, despite a series of UN Security Council resolutions passed since 2006 ordering a halt to all Iran's enrichment activity, allows it to continue to enrich uranium to five per cent.

Iran has insisted all along that it has a "right" to enrich nuclear fuel and, even though the international community disagrees, the P5+1 felt that to foster any possibility of successful negotiations, Iran should be allowed temporary, limited enrichment. Israel and Saudi Arabia vehemently disagreed and want to see all of Iran's 20,000 enrichment centrifuges eliminated. That's not going to happen either – according to the interim plan requiring Iran to limit its use of existing equipment and not make operational its new generation of more advanced centrifuges.

Negotiations on a comprehensive or long-term agreement are meant to address these and a number of other issues, including another potential pathway to an atomic bomb: Iran's development of a heavy water plutonium reactor. But it's not clear whether the comprehensive plan will address other components of Iran's nuclear program, such as its work on nuclear weapons devices and ballistic missiles capable of delivering them. Some news reports indicate these additional items will be covered in the negotiations, while other reports, citing Iran's abject refusal to even consider them as part of the negotiating process, deny it.

Even seasoned Israeli military correspondents such as Ron Ben-Yishai, writing for Ynetnews on Feb. 18 when the comprehensive talks were commencing, contributed to the confusion. Consider this passage: "The world powers are... demanding that Iran stop building a reactor and facilities accompanying the production of fissile material (plutonium) from used fuel rods. If Iran accepts this demand, it will stop being a threshold state and the West will have more than a year's warning if Tehran tries to make a breakthrough towards building a bomb. This will allow the West to properly prepare its options to prevent such a breakthrough, including a military response."

By definition, Iran cannot simultaneously cease to be a threshold state and retain a "breakthrough" capacity, since it is that breakthrough potential that defines a nuclear threshold state.

Even the more western-friendly "moderate" Iranian President Hassan Rouhani has declared that Iran will not dismantle any part of the country's nuclear facilities, thereby indicating how difficult it will be to deprive Iran of what is more typically called a "breakout" capacity.

In the meantime, Iran's conservative Supreme Leader Ali Khamenei, who makes the decisions about Iran's nuclear program, went on record on the eve of the latest talks as saying that "they will not lead anywhere."

Ironically, this is one subject on which both Khamenei and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu agree, though for entirely different reasons. Netanyahu fears Khamenei will get exactly what he wants – sanctions relief – while Iran, successfully dragging out the talks, remains a nuclear threshold state.

Even U.S. President Barack Obama has said the chance of negotiations succeeding are, at best, only 50/50. A relatively upbeat Feb. 20 press conference held by the parties does not alter these odds.

Paul Michaels is director of research and senior media relations for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

ASYLUM PROTEST

About 1,000 African asylum-seekers demonstrated last week opposite the open detention facility in Holot to protest the Israeli government's policy toward them. The protesters demanded that the government cancel a law that allows them to be held at the facility in southern Israel, release everyone currently held there and recognize them as refugees.

Can open Orthodoxy stand on its own?

Early last month, Rabbi Hershel Schachter, 72, the rosh yeshiva of Yeshiva University, issued a responsum regarding women and the wearing of tfillin. In his letter, Rabbi Schachter, a prominent authority figure in the Orthodox world, especially in North America, declared in no uncertain terms that women may not wear tfillin. He also compared those who follow the egalitarian stream of Orthodoxy to the disciples of Korach, who rebelled against the Jewish leadership of the desert-wandering years and were eventually swallowed up by the earth.

Rabbi Schachter's words were clearly aimed at the two New York-area Orthodox high schools that had previously announced they would encourage female students who want to wear tfillin to do so, but in the grand scheme of things, the letter was a shot across the bow of so-called "open Orthodoxy," the new(ish) brand of Judaism that campaigns, among other things, for more female inclusion in Orthodoxy, and claims there is precedent for doing so according to Jewish law.

In response to Rabbi Schachter, Rabbi Josh Yuter, 36, the open Orthodox leader of Manhattan's Stanton Street Synagogue (and one of Jewrotica's "Sexiest Rabbis of 2013"), tweeted: "The shorter version of R. Herschel Schachter's missive... is that the greatest sin a Jew can do is disagree with him." Two days later, Rabbi Yuter followed up with a post on his popular YUtopia blog in which he questioned Rabbi Schachter's classification as a "rav" – i.e., an authority on Jewish law – and suggested Judaism probably doesn't need that type of authority figure anymore anyways, concluding: "The democratization of knowledge is thus a significant threat to those who wish to control it, and by extension, the people who depend on it. R. Schachter must create and rely on his myth that he and his cadre are the true arbiters and representatives of Judaism, and by extension, God's will."

Rabbi Yuter's tweet and blog set off a storm online (I first caught wind of the story on the Facebook page of Rabbi Schachter's son, who posted the tweet along with the hashtag "#idiot"). Some say Rabbi Yuter had no right to challenge the older, wiser Rabbi Schachter – and especially not in such a public way. Others argue Rabbi Schachter's original responsum was an insult to Jewish women, and full of legal holes. Both points of view raise the question: how much longer can the Orthodox and open Orthodox share a religious umbrella?

The answer, I think, is not much – these two groups probably need to go their separate ways, for everyone's benefit. The truth is Orthodox Judaism has never been particularly "open," and open Orthodoxy will never have the sort of numbers necessary to outflank the ultra- and modern Orthodox. And if that means open Orthodoxy needs a new name, so be it (though the "neo-Conservative" moniker some have suggested sounds clunky to me).

Open Orthodoxy is gaining popularity because it celebrates complexity – the halachic imperative remains, but it is simultaneously countered by a refusal to accept the status quo and rabbinic hierarchy. It's a complicated religious response to our complicated age, and it's time to see whether the movement can stand on its own.

The CJN presents a wider view

I would like to congratulate The CJN on some of its recent articles that present broader, more nuanced perspectives on Israeli politics, including Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's refusal to attend Nelson Mandela's funeral in South Africa, and the rise of vigilantism by Jewish settler groups in the West Bank.

I was dismayed to see some readers react negatively. One of the many wonderful things about Israel is that it permits voices from across the political spectrum, including those critical of the government and its policies. This is the bedrock of any healthy democracy. It is ironic that many Diaspora Jews are less willing than Israelis themselves to tolerate diverging views.

Day's true colours

Notwithstanding former federal Conservative cabinet minister Stockwell Day's moving testimonial about the two boys whose fathers were killed in a terrorist attack ("A Canadian triumph over terror," The CJN, Feb. 13), Day's credentials listed at the end on the article are incomplete.

Day sits on the board of directors of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), an affiliation surprisingly not enunciated by Day in the article.

In his capacity as a board member, Day has represented the Jewish community at official events and contributes to the governance of CIJA, Canada's self- appointed group purporting to speak for the Jewish community.

Day and other board members who are not Jewish constitute 15 per cent of CIJA's board of director membership, raising serious questions as to the authenticity of CIJA as a Jewish organization. Even Independent Jewish Voices, anathematic to CIJA, is at least a bona fide Jewish organization.

Harper's visit to Israel

On reading the scholarly but misguided article about Prime Minister Stephen Harper's trip to the State of Israel ("Harper has made Israel a wedge issue," The CJN, Feb. 13), it easy to see why Adam Goldenberg is a former speech writer for the Liberal Party.

If the purpose of Harper's significant visit was merely to garner the Jewish vote for his re-election, he would have been much wiser to have sought the attention and approval of the Arab/Muslim vote since there are vastly more Muslims in Canada, and worldwide, than there are Jews.

I wholeheartedly believe that our prime minister has to be a man of courage and principled conviction to state Israel's dire position in his speech in the Knesset and thus to a worldwide audience.

Israel has tried to exchange land for peace, only to find ferocious response to its efforts – witness the disaster in Gaza. It is time that the Israelis are realistic and not swayed by wishful thinking.

No peace or two-state solution can be even contemplated until Palestinians can agree on one state being theirs and the other belonging to the Jewish People. This is a fundamental beginning to any sort of negotiation.

Phyllis Sugar

No Palestinian state on Jewish land

The problem is not that a Palestinian state will or will not recognize Israel as Jewish. The problem is that so many are willing to recognize a Palestinian state on Jewish land ("Recognizing Israel as Jewish is part of ending conflict," The CJN, Feb. 20).

First, Israel's historical and legal claims to the disputed territories are being totally ignored.

Second, a state that promises to cleanse their new country of Jews even as they cleanse it of Christians, both crimes against humanity, should never be allowed the right of birth.

Third, when the words and charters of the current Palestinian governments pledge to destroy Israel and its people while their imams justify it theologically, those governments should all be banished from the civilized world.

It is a tragedy that we are willing to hand over land that is ours to enemies who want us dead while we worry about how magnanimous they will be in granting us the right to be Jewish.

My son, the activist

Seven-year-old protests the inhumane treatment of animals in captivity

Miriam Porter

On Jan. 26, in the bitter cold and blowing snow, my seven-year-old son Noah and I spend two hours outside a marine aquarium in Toronto.

It is freezing out, almost -30C. After the first hour my extra socks, scarf, double sweaters and knitted leg warmers stop working. I am ready to leave but Noah refuses. He's the boss (sometimes) so I listen. He proudly holds a sign that reads "Free The Fishies!"and stands in front, with 40 other protesters behind him.

My sign reads, "Sea Life Belongs in the Sea Not Tanks" while other signs declare "Welcome to the Aqua Prison!" and "Wild Animals Belong in the Wild!"

With our teeth chattering, we energetically chant: "Shut It Down"! Onlookers and guests of the aquarium stare at us and shake their heads. One mother yells angrily, in front of her two young children, that we are wasting our time. She doesn't like being challenged on another point of view while waiting in line for a ticket – a ticket that is contributing to the destruction of our precious ecosystem.

This protest occurs as Japan's fishermen are brutally rounding up dolphins in Taiji to be slaughtered or held captive. Approximately 20,000 dolphins of all species are caught yearly in Japan. The dedicated Sea Sheppard Conservation Society Cove Guardians record this massacre for the world to witness.

Media around the world are finally starting to document the horrors of this yearly dolphin slaughter, and, because of films like The Cove (2009) and Blackfish (2013), social media has been ablaze with photographs and testimonials.

I am curious if rabbis and observant Jews believe the dolphin massacre to be an act of cruelty. Jewish law prohibits causing unnecessary suffering to animals. Tza'ar ba'alei chayim (kindness to animals) is the prohibition against causing pain to any living animal. I saw brutal recordings of the dolphins being captured and killed in Taiji where the blue water turns bright red and they are tortured for days until their vicious death. The dolphins are not being use for what Torah considers "legitimate needs, so I would hope families following Jewish law will not buy tickets to aquariums.

Additionally, there is nothing educational to be learned from an animal in captivity. You are not seeing the creature in its natural environment. Animals behind bars and in tanks do not behave in the same way they do when free – for zoo and aquarium owners it's all about making money. Noah has never visited animals in captivity, yet he will happily tell you about his favourite wild mammal thanks to books and films.

I am proud of my boy. Noah has the option of going to a movie on this freezing winter day but insists we attend the protest. This isn't his first protest and I am quite certain won't be his last. We recently attended a demonstration on Queen Street outside a popular clothing store selling Canada Goose jackets. The fur trim on the hoods of these jackets is the stolen life of a coyote.

Noah protesting outside the aquarium.

My little guy, the powerhouse, as other protesters call him, gives out over 300 leaflets about the horrors of the fur industry. Noah knows he's making a difference because he witnesses potential customers deciding not to go inside the store – and even others march back in to return their furry jacket once they learn the truth. That day we join other activists, including children, to speak out for the voiceless coyotes.

It has been wrongly suggested that I "convince" Noah to attend protests or rallies. Not only is this not true but it sadly undermines Noah's true passion for the causes he believes in. Noah was born with an empathetic desire to help others. At an early age he rescued ladybugs from park slides, worms from the rain soaked sidewalk and made the decision at age five to become vegan. "I don't want to eat my friends," he told me.

Of course it helps to lead by example. I have always taught Noah the importance of standing up for his rights and the rights of others. I have been an activist since I was 12 when I demanded my junior high school stop dissecting frogs in science class. Noah has seen my passion but his desire for change and equality run deep.

But how do you raise an activist? This was never my intention, but looking back there are perhaps several things that contributed to Noah's activism. Hanging on his bedroom wall are the articles of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child – all 54 of them. I tell Noah the truth, at age appropriate levels, about industries that exploit others and that it doesn't have to be this way. We discuss animal and child welfare organizations that can help.

Noah's first peaceful protest was at age four. We gathered with like-minded individuals to raise awareness about Tilikum – the 12,000-pound killer whale living in a bathtub at SeaWorld. Tilikum is the main character in the documentary Blackfish and has been in captivity for over 30 years despite killing several people, including his trainer.

We stood proud and held our signs high at Dundas Square in Toronto. Suddenly Noah asked me, "Does Tilikum know we care about him and that we are trying to set him free? Do you think he can hear us all the way at SeaWorld in Florida?"

I tell Noah he has the ability to make his voice heard all over the world if he wants to – he just needs to speak loud enough.

"We see you. We care. We're sorry. We're trying."

Our culture could use a dose of Jewish guilt

Sara R. Horowitz
in Toronto

My husband and I have a running joke about the television game show Jeopardy. We imagine it with Jewish categories. "I'll take medieval commentators for $200, Alex." (Alex, of course, is Canadian Alex Trebek, the show's long-standing host.) "Chumrot [halachic stringencies] for $300, Alex." "Aramaic texts for $500."

The absurdity of it is funny to us. Not that a Judaic version of Jeopardy is inherently absurd. It would, I think, be a good pedagogic tool in a Jewish education context. But the idea of broadcasting the minutia of Judaic knowledge as a mainstream trivia-based competition is, of course, a non-starter. Television strives for broad public appeal – the better to garner advertisers – and the audience for deep Jewish literacy comprises a very small chunk of the general public.

But I've been thinking lately that an overlay of Jewish commentary on mainstream popular culture might not be a bad thing. People joke about Jewish guilt complexes. Our culture doesn't have a monopoly on this, but if guilt feelings were an Olympic event, we'd be on the podium. Jewish writers and thinkers of the past century have made much of the inhibiting effect of guilt, shame and embarrassment on our fulfillment and happiness. Think early Philip Roth, or Freud.

Maybe it's a case of early millennial malaise, but I find myself longing for the return of guilt to the popular arena. It might put a curb on the cult of celebrity that has been spiralling downward. Think of it as a Jewish gift to the new future. Call it the new shame.

Media venues are currently awash with reminiscences of the debut of the Beatles in North America 50 years ago. Watching some of these appearances on the web remind us of how innocent that era was and of how jaded we have become. Today, there are few boundaries on what celebrities can do publicly without losing their following: nastiness, crime, callowness, addiction. Celebrity has become its own entity, with some celebrities celebrated not for anything they've done, but simply for being celebrities.

Take the example of the good-boy-turned-bad-boy Canadian pop icon who recently has been investigated for vandalism and driving while drunk. During one drunken evening, he was reportedly caught on camera urinating into a janitor's bucket. He's a kid, of course, immature and prematurely empowered by his celebrity. He's buffered by the wealth he's amassed, as well as by the admiring pack that travels with him and the adoration of fans. But what of the others on the road when he drives under the influence? What of the poor janitor who must deal with the sullied bucket?

Or take the mayor of the city I live in. He's excused lying about drug use because he was in a "drunken stupor" and couldn't recollect his actions. He, too, has driven under the influence, driven while texting – that is to say, been on the road and endangered others. He has singularly provided a wealth of Canadian material to late-night TV comedians.

Although I've mentioned Canadian illustrations because they hit close to home, the cult of celebrity without accountability is by no means solely a Canadian phenomenon. It's certainly entrenched south of the border.

Why does this matter? Why should the actions of people I've never met and see only through various media outlets have any bearing on me or my life, or on you and yours?

It matters because through their ubiquity, they set the parameters for acceptable behaviour. Their actions, combined with their lack of visible shame, convey the message that anything goes, even if it's illegal, tawdry or harmful to others. They inure us to behaviour that then becomes less shocking and comes to seem more ordinary, more acceptable.

More than a century ago, the American writer Mark Twain wrote, "Man is the only animal that blushes – or needs to." Blushing – a sign of embarrassment or shame – signals to us that something is off-kilter, that we need to address what we've done, to apologize, to change. These, of course, are the components of the Jewish concept of tshuvah.

But our celebrities don't blush, at least not publicly. And if they lead the cultural way, soon we, too, will no longer blush.

So, we're in double jeopardy. I'll take guilt for $1,000, Alex.

Poles, Jews and anti-Semitism

Rabbi Dow Marmur
in Toronto

On Jan. 27, the day when many countries marked International Holocaust Memorial Day, the Israeli daily Ha'aretz published the results of a recent survey, conducted by the reputable Centre for Public Opinion Research (CBOS) in Poland, about anti-Semitism in that country.

While almost half of the members of the Knesset and many Israeli public figures joined a delegation of Holocaust survivors on their pilgrimage to Auschwitz in Poland to mark the 69th anniversary of its liberation and participated in a memorial ceremony there, Poles and Jews were reminded that, despite efforts by the Polish government to foster a positive attitude toward Jews and Judaism, many Poles continue to harbour hatred of Jews with potentially lethal consequences for all.

The data are frightening: 23 per cent of the representative sample of 1,000 respondents said Jews would kill Christian children for ritual purposes. Only one per cent less affirmed that today's Jews are responsible for the killing of Jesus.

By all accounts, the Catholic Church in Poland has done much to shape this mindset. Thus, for example, a day before the Holocaust commemorations, the president of the small Jewish community in Poznan complained that a 17th-century fresco depicting the infamous blood libel adorns a wall in the local cathedral. When journalists had challenged the church leaders to offer at least an explanation to visitors, the clergy placed a note on a different floor with the ridiculous excuse that there was no room near the actual picture.

But it's by no means only religion that fuels the hatred. According to the CBOS survey, two out of five Poles believe that Jews rule the world, and roughly the same number maintain that it's the Jews who slander Poles by calling them anti-Semites. The glaring inconsistency between the two opinions didn't prevent about two-thirds of all Poles also to subscribe to various conspiracy theories involving Jews.

Ironically, while valiant efforts are being made to rebuild Jewish life in Poland, which has, in turn, alerted many Poles with Jewish forbears to come forward and even seek formal affiliation with the Jewish community, there's evidence of a mood that again may make life almost untenable for the relatively few Jews who live there now.

Most Poles insist that what happened to the Jews in their country during the Holocaust was entirely the work of German Nazis, with negligible collaboration by locals. When responsible and reputable scholars of Polish history bring incontrovertible evidence to the contrary, they're often met with hostility and worse.

Hatred of Jews, though it exists everywhere in the country, seems to be most prevalent in rural areas, where people would have never encountered a Jew. Citizens in the capital Warsaw and other urban centres are likely to be more open-minded.

In the course of my own travels in Poland, I've been impressed by the interest in, and knowledge of, Judaism among intellectuals and secular public figures. It's reflected in the many serious books published in the country, often written by local scholars.

Similarly, the Polish parliament has taken due notice of the CBOS report and is determined to continue its efforts to eradicate, or at least reduce, the disease of anti-Semitism. The government of Poland is encouraging Jews to live and work in the country. It also seeks to foster good relations with the State of Israel.

Tragically, Poland isn't the only European state infested with the hatred of Jews. The small Jewish communities in eastern and central Europe, as well as in Scandinavia and France, are being exposed to frequent anti-Semitic incidents. The remnant of the original and indigenous Europeans – as Jews have often been described because of their wholesome contribution to the cultural and economic life of the continent – may be forced to leave forever.

Poles living abroad, including Canada, can be no less prone to hating Jews, who in turn tend to reciprocate by voicing strong and equally unwarranted condemnations of all Poles.

It's with this in mind that in 1988, a few of us founded the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada. Our dual aim was to alert Jews to almost 1,000 years of Jewish history in Poland, much of it in relatively peaceful coexistence and, second, to promote understanding and co-operation between Polish and Jewish Canadians for the good of this country. A quarter of a century later, the need seems to be no less urgent.

Organization dedicated to human rights in Israel

Rabbinical student aims to unite Jews, Muslims

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Yonatan Shefa, assistant director of the occupied territories department at the group Rabbis For Human Rights in Israel, says his heart lies in bringing people of all backgrounds together.

Hired four years ago in an effort to bring new blood into the organization, which started up in the 1980s, he said that on his first day on the job, he got his boss's blessing to try and cultivate intercultural dialogue.

Shefa, a native of Toronto, and a rabbinical student at Yeshiva Sulam Yaakov in Jerusalem, spoke last week at an event sponsored by Congregation Darchei Noam's social justice advocacy committee.

Rabbis for Human Rights, which represents about 100 rabbis and rabbinical students from different streams of Judaism, is the only rabbinic organization in Israel explicitly dedicated to human rights.

Its mission is to inform the Israeli public about human rights violations and to pressure the state institutions to redress these injustices. It also engages in direct action to aid victims of human rights abuses.

The organization concentrates its work on such areas as rights of the poor, rights to housing, Bedouin rights in the Negev, human rights work in the occupied territories, promoting human rights education in Israel, and teaching human rights in pre-military academies.

Shefa said that several months ago, he arranged a meeting between students at his rabbinical school and a group of students from the largest Islamic college in Israel.

"We decided to meet at a park, break into groups of two or three, and go on a hike. Along with trail were small flags printed with questions, which the group discussed until it got to the next flag."

The questions started simply, he said, and then got more intimate, without getting into any political rhetoric.

"We tried to include questions that were challenging to both sides and that people answered from their own experience."

Shefa said that at that meeting, as well as others he has arranged, there is always "the first electrical moment [in which we discover] that 98 per cent of the people had never spoken to anyone from the other side.

"I love witnessing that moment. People tell me it is scary and exciting, but all it takes is that first step. Whatever conversation has not taken place is scary," he added.

"There is a lot to cultivate, but for me, that moment is crucial. It changes people's lives forever. They can no longer say they haven't spoken [to the other side]. It shifts people's hearts and outlooks."

Shefa said his background is in public policy – he has a master's degree from the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University – but his interest lies with people.

Yonatan Shefa

"If we have peace, we have the natural realization of human rights. It's important to bring everyone into conversation. If we're going to live in peace, it is going to take all of us. If you say 'you're wrong', then you've lost that person."

Support for those living with autoimmune diseases

World-renowned clinical nutritionist to speak at March 6 event

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Aaron's Apple, a charitable organization started by a child to help other children, helps fund the high costs of medication and treatment for families whose children suffer from chronic illnesses.

At a March 6 event for the charity, world-renowned clinical nutritionist Dr. Melvyn Grovit and psychotherapist Stacey Dombrowksy will speak to people living with inflammatory bowel disease and other autoimmune conditions.

"If you are suffering from Crohn's disease, ulcerative colitis, celiac, rheumatoid arthritis, allergies, eczema, psoriasis – or if you simply want to improve your health, this event will have something for everyone," said Mandy Maresky, co-founder of Aaron's Apple.

Your body's immune system protects you from disease and infection, but if you have an autoimmune disease, even the healthy cells in your body are attacked.

According to Dr. Edward Keystone, director of the Rebecca MacDonald Centre for Arthritis and Autoimmune Diseases at Mount Sinai Hospital in Toronto, "there are 50 known autoimmune diseases affecting two million Canadians."

Aaron Maresky

While we don't yet understand the causes of autoimmunity or how to cure it, "there is a huge sense of optimism surrounding their ultimate cure," he said.

Researchers are learning more about the immune system and why it becomes overactive, including the role of genetics.

Aaron's Apple was born from the belief that every child has the right to experience a happy and pain-free life. Parents of children with chronic illness are faced with the harsh reality that they are unable to control the illness with which their child has been diagnosed.

The options to ease the suffering of these children often come in the form of highly priced medical treatments. Some families are able to meet the high costs with medical insurance, while others are not as fortunate. Aaron's Apple helps families pay for expensive medication and treatments.

"I want to be able to help other sick children who aren't as lucky as I am, so I started a charity called Aaron's Apple when I was seven years old," said Aaron Maresky, now 12, co-founder of Aaron's Apple.

"I believe that, as parents, we have expectations, hopes, and dreams. When a child is diagnosed with a health problem or chronic illness, these aspirations are altered in some way. While one parent is hoping to see their child graduate from university, another is praying that the child can simply live a pain-free life," Dombrowsky said.

Grovit's mission is to do research and educate others about the benefits of nutritional therapy in the management of chronic illness. He has developed new clinical nutrition protocols for individuals living with Crohn's disease, ulcerative colitis and short bowel syndrome, focusing on the role of food and the microbiota (formerly known as gut flora, the microscopic living organisms in the bowel) in inflammatory diseases. Through the years, he has made a lasting impact on the lives of many individuals and their families.

The classic indicator of an autoimmune disease is inflammation, which can cause redness, heat, pain and swelling. Sufferers may have flare-ups, meaning the symptoms get worse, as well as remissions, when symptoms get better or disappear.

Dombrowsky will speak about living with a chronic illness and how it does not have to be a life sentence. Dombrowsky's approach to healing is naturalistic, spiritual, wide-ranging and eclectic, combining both traditional and the newest cutting-edge methods.

The event will be held at 7 p.m. at the SHAMBA Foundation, 48 Yonge St., Suite 1200, and will include a cocktail reception, food and a silent auction.

Citizenship bill opposed by Jewish groups

Represents 'a serious threat to rights of all Canadians,' lawyers say

But that didn't prevent JRAN's founder, Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld, from sharply criticizing the bill.

"I'm very concerned about the implications of this bill in terms of increasing the centralization of authority... specifically granting one minister the right to make decisions which, up until now, have been made by the courts," Rabbi Bielfeld said.

"As Jews and as human beings, we have a real need to make sure that every Canadian has the right to a legal hearing of his or her claim."

He compared Canada's proposal to Switzerland's recent decision to cap all immigration and introduce quotas.

"What we're seeing is a strong shift to the populism of the right that is going to affect many countries," said Rabbi Bielfeld, a longtime advocate for refugees. "As Jews especially, we know how dangerous it is when countries begin to close borders [to] people who are oppressed."

A scathing indictment of the proposals was issued recently by Lorne Waldman, president of the Canadian Association of Refugee Lawyers, and Audrey Macklin, professor of law at the University of Toronto.

Writing in the Toronto Star, Waldman and Macklin said Bill C-24 represents "a serious threat to the rights of all Canadians" because it would "make citizens vulnerable to abuse of power by the government" and "broadly expand the requirements for citizenship in ways that will make it inaccessible to many, while dramatically reducing a person's due process rights when the government seeks to take citizenship away."

An implicit "threat" in the bill is that if a naturalized Canadian citizen takes a job somewhere else or leaves Canada to study abroad, the government may move to strip the person of citizenship because they misrepresented their intention to reside in Canada, the pair claimed.

Rather than strengthening the rights of citizens, the bill "demeans citizenship. Like the changes to the refugee laws that Ottawa sold by branding refugees as bogus, these proposals represent new Canadians as objects of suspicion and mistrust."

Speaking on behalf of JIAS Canada, Mark Zarecki, executive director of Jewish Family Services in Ottawa, said the legislation would decrease the number of citizens who have "extra status" – immigrants who receive Canadian citizenship in addition to keeping their native citizenship status – and then leave permanently. "It should close that loophole," Zarecki said.

Overall, he said, he has "no serious qualms" about the bill.

2015 campaign chairs

United Jewish Appeal: the cause is right

Andrea Cohen and David Matlow
Special to The CJN

As the chairs of United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto's 2015 annual campaign, we, along with the chair of UJA's Women's Philanthropy, Alison Himel, share a common bond and the firm belief that Toronto's remarkable Jewish community can accomplish anything. That community, steadfast and united, can attend to the needs of the less fortunate and can support, educate and defend our Jewish right to live in peace in Israel and here in the Diaspora.

We are motivated and inspired to work on behalf of the countless Jewish men, women and children who are helped by the more than 100 UJA-funded agencies and programs for several reasons, including:

We all benefit from UJA. Toronto's UJA campaign is the third largest in North America, behind only New York and Chicago (and this is in absolute dollars, not per capita). Toronto is blessed with many uncommonly generous, visionary and compassionate UJA donors, all of whom believe in the caring community that UJA dollars help to create and nurture. This is something we should all be very proud of. The success of UJA's annual campaign – year after year – explains the strength, solidarity, safety and vibrancy of Jewish Toronto.

Andrea Cohen

David Matlow

Each year, we start fresh. Like they say in the stock market, past results are not proof of future performance. Each campaign starts from dollar zero. The funds that have been raised in the 2014 campaign during 2013 and that is wrapping up now will be fully allocated to support people and programs during the 2014 calendar year. The funds that the 2015 campaign will raise during 2014 will be spent during 2015.

Each donation is important. The number of people who are helped by funds raised in the campaign is so vast, and the programs and services funded by the campaign is so varied, that it is really hard for a donor or potential donor to fully understand how important each and every UJA donation is. We will try to help our community realize all that it does when it supports the campaign.

We could help more people. As successful as our campaign is, there are more people that could be helped if we were able to raise more money. We will try to help our community realize that every donation, large or small, is meaningful. Any donation could be the one that makes a difference in a person's life. Since the UJA is the common thread that binds us all together, we will try and inspire everyone with the capacity to do so to make a donation to the UJA this year.

UJA canvassers are the heroes. The voluntary canvassers, our unsung heroes, comprise the engine that drives the annual campaign. In this busy world in which everyone is short of time, there are 700 people who care enough about the condition of the Jewish people in Canada, Israel and across the globe that they are glad to share their talents and passions to help their fellow Jews by canvassing for UJA. We will try to help our community understand the vital, selfless role our canvassers play in the success of the annual campaign and how we can raise more funds and help more people by simply picking up the phone to answer the call, or by favourably responding to the offer to meet their canvasser for a coffee and conversation.

Most importantly, the cause is right. If you get past the various acronyms in our community's alphabet soup (most of which have a J in them somewhere), what UJA is really about is Jews helping each other fulfil our potential as individuals and as a people. This requires a social safety net for those who fall on hard times, care for all Jews during each phase of life, ensuring Jewish continuity, and preserving a strong Israel. This is what the UJA does.

As the 2015 campaign starts to roll out, we look forward to meeting current and new donors throughout the GTA to discuss our shared vision for our Jewish community. We look forward to working with our leadership cabinet and the vast team of volunteer canvassers in the important work of helping people. We look forward to welcoming anyone who wishes to join our team and help us help others. Being named chairs of Campaign 2015 is not an honour that we take lightly. We will do our best to serve Toronto's Jewish community and the many people who are touched by the funds raised by United Jewish Appeal.

Cotler unveils 'Never Again' manifesto for MPs

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Liberal MP Irwin Cotler will be presenting a "Never Again Manifesto" in the House of Commons that draws on the lessons of the Holocaust and is intended to prompt international action against present-day hate and genocide incitement.

The 12-point document, titled "Auschwitz, the Holocaust and Human Rights: Universal Lessons for Our Time," warns of the danger of state-sanctioned incitement. Although they're not named, Cotler said he has in mind in particular Iran and, for promoting hate, the Palestinian Authority.

"Parliamentarians have a responsibility to recognize, address and redress this crime," said Cotler.

Cotler, the Liberals' rights and international justice critic, said he drafted the manifesto following the commemoration held at Auschwitz on International Holocaust Remembrance Day on Jan. 27.

Irwin Cotler

Cotler was the only Canadian parliamentarian among the largest number of politicians ever to attend the anniversary of the 1945 liberation of the death camp in Poland.

Nearly half of Israel's Knesset members were present, along with many Polish parliamentarians and broad representation from other European countries.

Cotler said he was asked by the delegation to put on paper principles that can be used as a guide to combating current gross violations of human rights.

He said many of the politicians were not aware that 1.3 million people were murdered at Auschwitz from 1942 to 1944 and that 1.1 million of them were Jewish.

Cotler unveiled the manifesto to the media Feb. 10 and subsequently to the Liberal caucus, which he said received it wholeheartedly. Within about a month, he plans to present it to the House of Commons as a motion, for which he hopes to receive unanimous support.

Groups protest Barak visit to B.C.

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) in British Columbia is "obviously thrilled" that former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak is set to visit Surrey on Feb. 27 to attend an economic conference, despite efforts by militant Palestinian supporters to block him.

In an "open letter" to Surrey, B.C., Mayor Diane Watts and Surrey city council, the Canada-Palestine Association calls Barak an "Israeli war criminal."

"It is like inviting a bank robber and killer with blood on his hands to address the banking industry."

The letter also supports the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaign against Israel.

Darren Mackoff, director of CIJA's Pacific region, told The CJN in an email that his group was "obviously thrilled that... Barak will be speaking at the Surrey Regional Economic Summit and highlighting the budding partnership between Israel and Western Canada."

But he did not address a specific question about the effort to stop him from attending.

Surrey city councillor Linda Hepner told The CJN Feb. 21 the summit is strictly non-political and that her city would not consider rescinding its invitation.

"It's all about an economic summit, not a political platform," she said. "We're thrilled to have the three former prime ministers here for the occasion."

Former Australian prime minister Julia Gillard and former Greek prime minister George Papandreou are scheduled to join Barak at the annual Surrey summit to discuss what can be learned from their economies.

The open letter calls Barak a "terrorist" and cites alleged examples of his "war crimes." They include the 1988 targeted assassination of Palestinian leader Khalil El Wazir in Tunis, and a "Gaza massacre" from Dec. 28, 2008 to Jan. 18, 2009.

"It seems to us that the city of Surrey is following in the footsteps of the Canadian Conservative government which is making Canada and now Surrey part of Israeli occupied territory," the letter states.

"We ask all the Surrey councillors to come clean and disassociate themselves from what the mayor is doing."

Other signatories of the letter include Canadian Boat to Gaza, and Independent Jewish Voices Vancouver.

Bringing a female voice to Orthodox spirituality

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — "Maha-What? Maharat!"

The title of Maharat Rachel Kohl Finegold's presentation at the Le Mood conference last November reflected how unfamiliar her groundbreaking role is to Jewish Montrealers.

Few realize that the title denotes that she is among the first women ordained as clergy within the Orthodox movement. Kohl Finegold was one of three in the inaugural graduating class last June of Yeshivat Maharat in the Bronx, N.Y.

In August, Kohl Finegold became director of education and spiritual enrichment at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, Montreal's largest synagogue, which dates back to 1846.

"Maharat" is a Hebrew acronym that translates as female leader in Torah, spirituality and religious law.

Kohl Finegold, 33, and her classmates completed a rigorous four-year program, with almost exactly the same studies as for the rabbinate, that qualifies them to do almost everything a rabbi can – as long as it's within the Orthodox understanding of Halachah, or Jewish law.

The graduates are certified "spiritual leaders and decisors of Jewish law," that is, competent to determine halachic issues, teach Torah in public, to officiate at life-cycle events, and provide spiritual and pastoral counselling.

The program has been controversial since its creation by activist Rabbi Avi Weiss. In May, the Rabbinical Council of America, which represents more than 1,000 Orthodox rabbis in 14 countries, denounced the impending ordination of women as "a violation of mesorah [tradition]… that contradicts the norms of our community."

Far from feeling defensive, Kohl Finegold responds that she is encouraged, because the statement also expresses support like never before for "advanced women's learning" and "halachically and communally appropriate professional opportunities" for learned women.

At Shaar Hashomayim, Kohl Finegold is a member of the clergy team.

Kohl Finegold, who has a warm, down-to-earth personality, downplays her trailblazing role, insisting that whatever she does at Shaar Hashomayim – or did at the Chicago synagogue where she worked before her ordination – has been done by women before and is not really a break with tradition, except that her qualifications and duties are formally recognized.

"I'm not really changing anything. It just looks different," she said in an interview. "There may have been skeptics at the beginning, but people see that I am deeply Orthodox… and not trying to make a statement or waves or be the token woman."

Rachel Kohl Finegold

She grew up in "a typical 1980s Orthodox Brooklyn family," but didn't think about a career as a Jewish leader until well after graduating from Boston University with a major in religion.

Since childhood she felt herself to be "a natural teacher, but I didn't want to be in a classroom, I wanted something more creative."

Three years at the Drisha Institute in New York, taking advanced Jewish and communal leadership studies, led to her to being hired as education and ritual director at Chicago's Anshe Sholom B'nai Israel Congregation.

Kohl Finegold was quite content with that role when she was headhunted, as it were, by Maharat Sara Hurwitz, dean of Yeshivat Maharat, and the very first woman it ordained in 2009. Kohl Finegold was one of only five women occupying such a high level of leadership at a U.S. Orthodox synagogue at the time.

Speaking in her comfortable office at Shaar Hashomayim, where toys and children's games are on the shelves beneath holy texts, Kohl Finegold said she was attracted to the possibility of being ordained because "it's hard to do the job without official credentials or title. People don't know what to call you or what questions they can ask you…

"Being a maharat allows me to do the job more effectively. It clarifies my role."

At the Shaar, Finegold gives sermons from the pulpit, but does not lead services, except to recite the prayers for the governments of Canada and Israel. She can marry a couple – although she has not been called upon to do so thus far – but cannot sign the ketubah.

She does not sit on the bimah with her male colleagues, but rather in the front row of one of the women's sections on either side behind the low-rise mechitzah. She can stand on the bimah to speak when no prayers are in progress.

She does not wear a kippah or tallit at services. At all times, she wears a hat or scarf and a skirt. Covering her head is her choice, something she feels she must do as a married Orthodox woman, and not a requirement of a maharat.

She hasn't had much time to form associations outside the Shaar Hashomayim yet, but is pleased that she was asked to speak to the Kollel Torah MiTzion to senior high school girls.

"Basically, we are trying to find a way to make women feel more connected to Judaism, to be more active in ritual, while remaining within Jewish law," she said.

Change starts with the young and in small steps for Kohl Finegold. One of her innovations is extending to girls Shaar Hashomayim's tradition of appointing "bimah boys," post bar-mitzvah teens who help out at services.

Harper's Israel's trip worth $239,000 price tag: CIJA

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Prime Minister Stephen Harper's trip to Israel reportedly cost at least $239,000, but many members of the Jewish community say it was worth it for its impact.

"We believe that the bilateral relationship was advanced significantly as a result of this trip – including the prime minister's decision to include senior cabinet ministers with mandates to expand the partnership with Israel in many key sectors of the economy," said Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, who was part of the prime minister's delegation.

"Certainly for the Jewish community it provided much valued twin-validation of our place in Canada as well as our connection and commitment to the Jewish state."

Fogel, whose flight was paid for by CIJA but who had three nights' accommodation covered as part of Harper's delegation, added that the composition of the 208-member trip "was varied, reflecting the broad range of Canadian stakeholders in the Canada-Israel relationship."

Twenty-one rabbis were among those who accompanied Harper. One of them, Rabbi Philip Scheim, spiritual leader of Toronto's Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, downplayed the idea that the cost was high.

"It's such a minor expenditure in day-to-day political life," he said. "To show our compassion and concern for other parts of the world and those engaging in a peace process, it's worth it."

Bernie Farber, former head of the now-defunct Canadian Jewish Congress and a former federal Liberal candidate, who is now senior vice-president of government and external relations for Gemini Power Corp., said the trip "feeds into a kind of… frenzy" in the Canadian Jewish community when it comes to Harper.

"The only thing that seems to matter right now for Canadian Jewish leadership is Israel, to the exclusion of many other policy matters that Harper has brought forward that are not in the best interests of our community, and we have just remained silent," he said, noting recent legislation that denies health care to refugees.

But Rabbi Scheim said the trip could have an impact on the peace process.

"Now [Harper] has an opening to use Canada's influence to lead Israel in a good direction and help create the environment where there could be increased dialogue," he said, noting that Harper also met with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas while he was in the region.

Both Rabbi Scheim and Farber agreed that many delegates were valuable to have on the trip – for example, the rabbi said his experience in Israel with Harper has allowed him to convey his insights to the community and his congregation – but they both said there were some questionable inclusions.

Farber said that in particular, the far-right Jewish Defence League should not have been represented because of what he called its homophobia and Islamophobia.

"They have shown their stripes in that respect," he said. "I don't know why anybody in politics would want to be associated with them."

JDL national director Meir Weinstein said going on the trip was "recognition of our contribution… in defence of the community," adding that the organization paid for the flight, but not the accommodations, of its lone representative. He also denied that his group is homophobic and islamophobic.

Weinstein said his group marched with the Jewish LGBT group Kulanu when it took a stand against an anti-Israel group's participation in Toronto's gay Pride parade, and regarding Islam, he said the JDL is "just trying to expose organizations that want Israel destroyed."

On the whole, Farber said the trip was worth the cost, even if it was a bit over-the-top in its display of support for Israel.

"On the one hand, we all understand the need for strong support and we love that a prime minister like Stephen Harper who has shown that support, but we also have to be visionary," he said. "We have to understand that not everything can be based on Harper's support of Israel."

Mount Sinai gets $5M gift for new NICU

'Units are critical to saving babies lives,' says Newton Glassman

CJN Staff

Mount Sinai Hospital is set to open a newly constructed neonatal intensive care unit (NICU) this fall, thanks to a $5-million donation from the Newton Glassman Charitable Foundation.

Mount Sinai's NICU, the largest in the GTA, is one of three in Toronto that provides Level 3 care, the highest level of care for premature babies.

In recognition of the Glassman foundation's second major gift – in 2007, it helped purchase life-saving equipment such as ventilators, for the NICU – the unit will be called the Newton Glassman Charitable Foundation Neonatal Intensive Care Unit.

Glassman, a volunteer and member of Mount Sinai's board, is founder of Canada's second-largest private equity firm, The Catalyst Capital Group Inc.

He said that "neonatal intensive care units are extraordinary places and are critical to saving babies' lives. I am a strong supporter of this area in health care and [am] both honoured and inspired to support Mount Sinai's talented and high-performing team of clinicians."

The Glassman NICU, will have 58 individual suites, which replaces the existing open concept model.

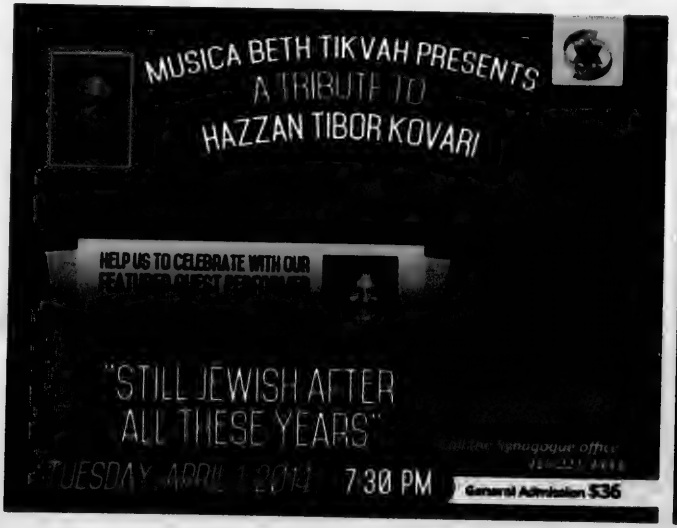
Other features include expanded space per infant, private rooms with parent sleep space, networked technology and electronic clinical documentation to ensure nurses have remote access to patients' vital information, enhanced infection control, retractable walls to accommodate families with multiple births, shared family space equipped with a kitchenette, dining area, a lounge and children's play area, and overnight guest rooms for out-of-town families.

Dr. Shoo Lee, pediatrician-in-chief, said there's been "a major shift in care for infants in neonatal intensive care units where families have become an equal part of the care team.

"This gift will help us facilitate the physical changes needed to maximize the benefits of this new model and empower parents with the environment they need to provide the best care for their infants."

Joseph Mapa, president and CEO of Mount Sinai, said "the clinical expertise and leadership in our neonatal intensive care unit is a crucial area for our hospital. This gift will allow Mount Sinai and flagship programs like women's and infants' health to continue to evolve and reflect changing patients needs and the latest models of health care."

Kristen Schulze holds her newborn Ryan in Mount Sinai Hospital's neonatal intensive care unit. Ryan is one of two twins who were born 12 weeks early.



Five Lev Tahor kids now live in foster care

The father lodged a complaint with youth protection that his kids were not being adequately cared for by the Lev Tahor families they were with.

Moscowicz, a marriage counsellor and social worker, came into the picture when a rabbinical council serving Outremont-area chassidic communities asked him to interview the couple to see if their troubled marriage was salvageable.

Today, the five children live in the Moscowiczs' comfortable house in Mile End, in the heart of a chassidic neighbourhood. The couple have six children of their own, with five still living at home. Their eldest teenaged daughters have been a great help.

How long they will be in foster care has not been determined, Moscowicz said.

Three of the children were seen by a visitor one day. They appeared healthy and happy, flourishing under the care of this gentle couple who clearly love children. One laughing toddler repeatedly came in to show her foster father a new bow in her hair.

Their father, who no longer belongs to Lev Tahor, lives in Montreal and visits his children almost daily, Moscowicz said. Their mother remains with Lev Tahor, which last November resettled in Chatham, Ont.

She has had health problems, Moscowicz said, and has little contact with the children.

Moscowicz's claims that the children were not cared for well within Lev Tahor were refuted by the group's spokesperson, Uriel Goldman.

Goldman told The CJN that Moscowicz is making assumptions based on hearsay.

"He never was in Lev Tahor, ever. He never came to meet with us," Goldman said.

Moscowicz is the descendant of a rabbinical dynasty of one of the smaller chassidic groups, and identifies today most closely with the Satmar and Belz communities. He wears the traditional earlocks and short pants. He was born and grew up in Montreal, and left for Israel where he married and lived for around 15 years before returning to Montreal about five years ago.

When the rabbinical court approached him last year he said, he knew little about Lev Tahor. "I heard people talking about them. It was very scary. But it was not my business, what could I do?" He was reluctant at first when the rabbis asked him to speak to the couple, whom he met separately.

Since fostering the children, Moscowicz has been contacted by former Lev Tahor members who have told him about life on the inside. He never visited their former Ste-Agathe enclave himself.

Moscowicz said he personally has met three women who were forced to marry while underage, and has heard reliable information about others.

Goldman denied that members are cowed by their leader. Goldman, who has been with Lev Tahor for more than 20 years, said he comes from a prominent Israeli family – his father was a surgeon – and served in the Israel Defence Forces.

"These are ridiculous allegations. Rabbi Helbrans is a straight guy. He says exactly what he thinks. You can ask him anything directly… about why you are doing this… Every single point is discussed.

"But we believe that if you practise Judaism, it has to be the right way. This is very reasonable."

As for the order by a Quebec court in November, upheld on Feb. 3 by an Ontario court, that 14 children from two Lev Tahor families should be placed in temporary foster care because of gross neglect, Goldman responded that the community was under investigation for two years and received "hundreds" of visits by police and child-welfare workers and "they found nothing… We were not charged with anything.

"It is very difficult to hide such a thing [abuse]. If small children are questioned a lot by a social worker, if there is a trauma like that, they will talk."

It would be "impossible," in any case, he added, because abuse is "against the Torah."

He said Lev Tahor wants to go to court and be cross-examined on these allegations. "Take us to court. Let's see if it's true or not."

Moscowicz said Lev Tahor believes, as is prescribed in the Zohar, that if at least one community of Jews in the world adheres "100 per cent" to Judaism then the Mashiach will come.

"For sure, the way they are acting is against the Torah, against everything it means for normal living," said Moscowicz. "But [Rabbi] Helbrans mixes in a lot of Judaism, and they pray so well and long, but it is all forced. By us, no one is forced to pray."

Moscowicz is worried about the 18-minute video Rabbi Helbrans released on Feb. 14, in which he accuses child-welfare workers, the courts and other authorities of persecuting Lev Tahor, going so far as to charge that they are the victims of attempted "genocide."

Moscowicz has not seen the video, only heard about it, but said, "We have to answer that video. We are not fighting with Quebec, and Quebec is not fighting with us. Youth protection is not against Lev Tahor. They are trying to help the children, and we have to be thankful."

Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs Quebec vice-president Luciano Del Negro said he is satisfied that the Quebec youth protection department has "acted with thoroughness and sensitivity in dealing with Lev Tahor.

"Youth protection has acted in a responsible manner. It didn't rush in… It did due diligence and ensured that any action taken was evidence-based," he said. "And not one, but two judges has found the evidence compelling…

"A great deal of thought and care went into determining how to act in the best interests of the children and meet their specific needs."

Few inner resources to help reconnect with our culture

However, it is difficult for Israelis to know where to begin in establishing their new Jewish identity. There are few inner resources to help us reconnect with our Jewish culture, heritage and pride. We are the desert generation. Learning the Jewish way of life in the Diaspora is not a natural instinct for many of us, and it is something we need to learn, to make an effort, and to understand, in order to appreciate it and recognize the immense beauty and value in our heritage. But we have to do it, if not for ourselves, then for the future generations, our kids and grandkids. If we do not make this effort, our children will grow up with a lack of Jewish identity or with a new identity that will be a reflection of their non-Jewish secular surroundings.

As this realization sinks in, people will all choose their own way to connect: sending their children to Jewish and/or Israeli schools, sending them to Jewish camps, attending or enrolling the kids in Judaism-related classes, celebrating Jewish holidays, supporting the Jewish community, volunteering or making a donation to a Jewish cause/organization, attending synagogues. But most of all, we will have to thaw out the misconceptions, antagonisms and ignorance that many of us, secular Israelis, have about Judaism and about our fellow Jews in the Diaspora.

We have to make sure we pass on the torch, as it has been passed to us and to our ancestors for thousands of years. If we don't show the way to our kids, if we don't act as role models, get involved in the community and show we care and are proud of our Jewish heritage, as well as of our Israeli heritage, our kids will never learn or care, will have no Jewish identity, and are highly likely to grow up outside Judaism and dissipate into the open arms of Canadian multicultural society.

If we value the Jewish future of our children, and if we value carrying on the amazing story of the Jewish People, then we need to act now, because if we don't, we will not be giving our children the best opportunity to retain that which we value – our Jewish identity. While this is perhaps easily kept in a Jewish society in Israel, it is not easily maintained in a secular Canada.

Are we, Israelis in the Diaspora, going to close the circle and re-learn how to become Jews, or are we going to gradually fade into Jewish non-existence? When we lived in Israel, we paid a high price for being Israelis through wars, military service, isolation and high taxes. Similarly, life as a Jew outside of Israel has its price – a price that I say is well worth paying for the sake of our kids, Israel and the Jewish People.

Sara Dobner is a member of the board of directors of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, a member of the advisory board of Kachol Lavan, and chair of Hamifgash, the Israeli identity program at the Schwartz/Reisman Jewish Community Centre in Vaughan, Ont.

Move over Shushan: 'other' Purims

Jewish & Digital
Mark Mietklewicz

Other Purims? Most of us are familiar with the holiday that begins in just over two weeks. You know: Achashverosh, Vashti, Haman, Mordechai and Esther. Hanging, happiness and hamantashen. Well it turns out that aside from that tale, there are dozens of other Purims out there.

Why are these holidays named after Purim "and not Pesach or Chanukah, each of which likewise celebrates Jewish redemption from the designs of our enemies?" Rabbi Shlomo Jakobovits points out that Jews are not supposed to rejoice in the downfall of an enemy. We don't celebrate the death of the Egyptians and there is no mitzvah of feasting and revelry on Chanukah.

Purim is different. The Megillah tells us that Purim's villain, Haman, is a descendant of Amalek, the tribe said to confront Jews from generation to generation. Just as Jews are commanded to celebrate the defeat of Haman on Purim, communities or families who have defeated their own "Hamans" have proclaimed their own "Purims." [http://bit.ly/othpurim1]

These "Purims" transcend time and international borders, and present a fascinating glimpse into the oppression of the Jews – and their salvation:

Purim Vincent: In 1614, baker Vincent (Vintz) Fettmilch organized attacks on the Jews of Frankfurt-am-Main and forced them to leave their city. "After several months, the king of Germany learned that a flagrant injustice had been done to the Jews. He commanded that the baker be killed, his house destroyed, his body beheaded, quartered and hung on the gates of the city." The king called on the Jews to return to their homes with full honours. They proclaimed a celebration on the 20th of Adar. [bit.ly/othpurim2]

Purim of Sharif (Magistrate): "The city of Tripoli, which contained a large Jewish community, was threatened with extermination when the ruler of Tunis besieged the city. The leader had threatened to kill all the inhabitants of the city. With just one last fortress to conquer, a sudden epidemic spread among his soldiers and he was forced to withdraw with the remains of his army." The Jews of Tripoli instituted the 24th of Tevet as a Purim. [bit.ly/othpurim3]

Purim Hitler: Observed on the 20th of Kislev, the day the Jews of Casablanca were liberated from the Nazi invaders in 1942. The "Hitler megillah" proclaimed, "And the month... was turned for us from sorrow to rejoicing and the making of holiday and the giving of gifts to the poor. Cursed be Hitler, cursed be Mussolini." [bit.ly/othpurim4]

Sometimes "other" Purims follow deliverance from a looming natural disaster:

Purim of Ancona: Celebrated by Greek Jews on the 21st of Tevet to remember severe earthquakes that occurred in that city on that day (Dec. 29, 1690), threatening a great catastrophe. The feast is preceded by a fast, and special prayers are ordained for both days.

Purim di Fuoco ("Fire Purim"): Observed by the Jews of Padua on the 11th of Sivan, to commemorate the great conflagration in that city in 1795, which was extinguished through extraordinary efforts on the part of the vice-magistrate.

Looking for more Purims? After all, who can say no to a story with a happy ending? The Jewish Encyclopedia lists over two dozen other Purims for your perusal. [bit.ly/othpurim5]

The example of a balanced life

Sephardi Window
Rabbi Ilan Acoca

I recently attended a Shabbaton in Seattle with some of my congregants.

One of the speakers was Rabbi Daniel Bouskila, the director of the Sephardic Educational Center, who gave an eloquent sermon on "Rav Yitzhak Nissim: The Somewhat Forgotten Sephardic Chief Rabbi."

Rabbi Bouskila spoke about the greatness of Rabbi Nissim, his scholarship, courage, simplicity and softness.

Rabbi Nissim was born in Baghdad in 1896, studied at the Jewish Religious Academy there, and became known for his scholarship at an early age. In 1925, he immigrated to Jerusalem. In 1926, he published his first major commentary, Tzedaka U-Mishpat. His home soon became a meeting place for scholars and community leaders.

Prior to his election as Sephardi chief rabbi of Israel, Rabbi Nissim did not hold any public position and was a businessman.

Chacham Nissim was elected chief rabbi in 1925 and soon became a key figure on the Chief Rabbinate Council. As Sephardi chief rabbi, he also served as president of Israel's Rabbinical High Court. Noted for his independence of thought, Rabbi Nissim sought to create a harmonious relationship among all sections of Israel's society, including its secular element. He frequently travelled to kibbutzim to discuss religion with kibbutz members.

At times, Rabbi Nissim showed extreme bravery.

His most famous such act was his refusal to meet Pope Paul VI during the papal visit to the Holy Land in January 1964, after the pope refused to meet the Jewish religious leadership.

His reason was that Pope Paul VI spent only 11 hours in Israel and avoided Israeli-controlled west Jerusalem, refusing to meet there with Rabbi Nissim. The rabbi, therefore, refused to attend the official welcome arranged in Megido.

Rabbi Nissim was highly criticized by many officials, who even publicly proclaimed that if he did not meet the pope, he would have to resign. However, Rabbi Nissim showed great courage and did not change his decision.

A few years later, Chacham Nissim attacked Pope Paul VI for his implied criticism of Israel's reprisal raid on Beirut Airport, and he accused the pope and the Vatican of conducting a "general campaign" against the Jewish religion and the Jewish People. The chief rabbi alleged that the pope was not moved by the lives lost in the terrorist bombing of the Machane Yehuda market place in Jerusalem a month earlier, "but he hurried to console Lebanon after the destruction of a few planes without loss of life." The rabbi thus again showed great leadership.

However, Rabbi Nissim also had the trait of Aaron the high priest, who was known to be loving and one who pursued peace.

One of his famous statements was that the rabbis of our generation should go down to the nation rather than having the people come to them.

What struck me the most about this illustrious leader was his ability to be like both Moses and Aaron.

Moses was known to be direct and blunt, while Aaron was the soft compromiser who desired nothing more than harmony within the nation.

Rabbi Nissim was a blend of both.

Let us all learn from Chacham Nissim about living a balanced life.

A new give-and-take with Israel

Class Act
Daniel Held

Once upon a time, Jews gave money to a fledgling state to ensure its survival. Blue-and-white JNF pushkes represented the hope of a struggling nation held together by young kids walking up and down New York subway cars in June 1967 collecting nickels and dimes. I have planted trees on Tu b'Shvat to help the Negev bloom, walked to raise money for immigrants and donated to build the educational and social welfare infrastructure of a country that is still a relative infant among the family of nations. Having seen it first hand, there's no question that our philanthropic dollars help build a country of which we should be proud.

But today is not 1948, 1967, 1973 or 1991. While we continue to support the growth of the periphery, the building of reservoirs and the security of cities under siege, we are also told the story of the start-up nation. Israel is a country that has played key roles in the development of the iPhone, laptops and SodaStream, a country that sells apps to Google and has discovered offshore gas that will fund a sovereign wealth fund worth billions.

Our relationship with Israel has changed, and Jewish education is the beneficiary.

I once watched a video of Golda Meir addressing an American audience asking for money. Today, I am participating in an online jam session in which Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is asking stakeholders around the world to deliberate on how the State of Israel should invest in global Jewish education.

Let me take a step back.

Birthright Israel has been a game-changer in Jewish education. It's the first initiative that will reach 50 per cent market penetration – in the coming years, 50 per cent of Jews aged 18 to 26 will have visited Israel; it has changed the way we link Israel to Jewish identity; and, most strikingly, it marks the first time the State of Israel has invested strategically in Diaspora Jewish identity. Birthright remains a three-way partnership funded by local Jewish federations, a group of philanthropists, and the government of Israel.

Since its investment in Birthright, the State of Israel has taken other steps to support Jewish education. It supports long-term Israel programs through Masa, it has reformatted the types of educational emissaries it sends around the world – including shinshinim, who penetrate day schools, supplementary schools, Hillels, synagogues and summer camps in Toronto and elsewhere – and it has shifted the Jewish Agency's agenda to focus not only on aliyah but on Jewish identity.

Last summer, the government took this relationship a step farther when it announced the Prime Minister's Initiative, which will invest $300 million each year in Jewish education. This week, hundreds of educators and stakeholders are participating in an online jam session, discussing how these funds could be used to benefit both Israel and global Jewry.

The relationship between world Jewry and Israel used to be unidirectional. We offered money to support a fledgling state. At the time, that was needed. Today, by mutual necessity, it's symbiotic. Just as we continue to value and invest in the growth and development of the state, the State of Israel values and invests in the growth and vitality of world Jewry.

A sanctuary should be built by peace

From the Bimah
Rabbi Yael Splansky

It is a twisted irony that during the very week when we read Parshat Trumah, a synagogue was vandalized. When we read the Torah's description of how to build a holy place, the Tabernacle, another holy place, Kehillat Ra'anan, was defaced. Rabbi Tamar Kolberg and the members of her vibrant Reform Jewish community in Israel were shocked to find graffiti scrolled across the façade of their synagogue.

The preschool students, their parents and teachers were the first to see what was described as a "tattoo," the letters burned into the Jerusalem stone building. What was the message of the violators? It was not about occupation or settlements, but sinat chinam, senseless hatred of Jew against Jew.

It isn't the first time. Stones have been thrown to shatter the windows of the Reform and Conservative synagogues in the otherwise quiet and dignified community of Ra'anana. But the letters spray-painted on the walls this time are more dangerous. Scrawled were two source references, for this is the way one Jew talks to another Jew – through sacred texts. The way these texts were used like weapons, however, is an abomination, an affront to God. The first source reference was Psalm 139: 21-22: "Do I not hate them, O God, those who hate You? And am not I grieved by those that rise up against You? I hate them with perfect hatred. I count them as my enemies."

The second source reference points to Rambam's Laws of Repentance, Chapter III, 14: "None of them has a place in the World to Come, even though they are Jews. They are cut down and lost, doomed by the magnitude of their wickedness forever… infidels, unbelievers in Torah… sinners."

Misplaced and misguided, these slanderous words were assigned to Reform Jews who read from the same Torah, honour the same Shabbat, sing the same prayers to the same God.

The police say they have investigated, but no suspects have been identified. It seems the authorities tolerate those who show no tolerance for Liberal Judaism. And so the attacks continue.

Rabbi Gilad Kariv, the president of the Israeli Movement for Progressive Judaism, calls upon the Orthodox rabbis and leaders of Ra'anana to publicly denounce these unlawful acts of extremism, but he also calls upon the Israeli public to "wake up from its slumber and take revolutionary educational and social steps that will allow all of us to lead meaningful and significant Jewish lives, based on a worldview that stems from our great Torah legacy, for 'its ways are the ways of pleasantness and all her paths lead to peace.'" (Proverbs 3:17) The perpetrators of this hate crime may believe they are motivated by their devotion to God and Torah, but that's impossible. By definition, only actions sincerely devoted to God and Torah lead to peace. When a person defaces a synagogue, he is motivated by something altogether different.

The graffiti have been sandblasted away by now, but the memory must motivate us to self-correct an ugly trait that shows itself from time to time among the Jewish People – in Ra'anana, at the Kotel, in Toronto. Let the words of Parshat Trumah instruct us: "Make for Me a sanctuary," God says, "so that I may dwell among them." Some sanctuaries are built of mortar and brick, some are built with words. All are built and sustained by peace.

Torontonians help spread the light of Torah in new home

Revitalizing the(olive)oil business in Israel

Jennifer Tzivia MacLeod
Special to the CJN

Two Torontonians are taking charge to revitalize one of Israel's oldest agricultural areas.

Combining tzedakah and environmentalism, Nili Abrahams and Rabbi Shmuel Veffer, through their new organization, Shemen LaMeor, are harvesting olives that would otherwise be wasted, creating pure oil to raise money for yeshivas, schools and food programs for needy families in their community, Yavne'el, and throughout the Lower Galilee.

Abrahams said the phrase shemen lameor, from the Torah, means "oil that illuminates. The whole purpose is to use the oil to spread light... and light is Torah."

To highlight the importance of trees, the pair, along with local rabbis and other community members, unveiled the organization this past Tu b'Shvat. The organization will use the area's surplus olives and boutique kosher olive oil to build relationships within and beyond Israel.

They are also raising awareness about the increasingly dire situation in the region. The Lower Galilee, two hours from Jerusalem, had strong agricultural origins, which still attract many olim.

"People love the idea of connection with the land," says Abrahams, "of a safe haven for the children... a very simple lifestyle." Yet that agricultural way of life is threatened by many forces.

Twenty minutes from Tiberias, Yavne'el, home to 3,000 residents, "had an incredible heyday of agriculture: tobacco, date palms, olives, citrus," Abrahams says.

But the older generation of farmers can't maintain their fields. And, she says, "if farmers can't afford to keep up their farms... there is a significant number of Arabs waiting to buy up the land."

According to the latest Israeli Census Bureau statistics, for 2011, the Arab population in northern Israel (not including Haifa) is just over 53 per cent, while Jews make up just under 44 per cent.

The Israeli government and organizations such as Nefesh b'Nefesh have been battling to rebuild the Jewish presence in the region since the 1980s.

In December 2013, the World Zionist Organization's settlement division announced its intention to build two new towns for 100,000 Jewish residents. At the time, MK Hanna Swaid criticized the move as part of a "demographic war" that is meaningless without "infrastructure improvements and a reduction in the... employment gaps."

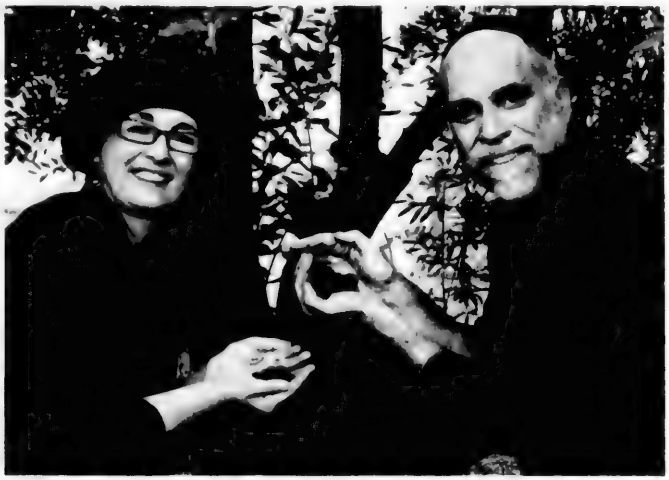
Idyllic in some ways, life in the Lower Galilee can be devastating for families. "Most of the men aren't home for the week, just for Shabbat. Some travel to Jerusalem, some travel to Bnei Brak... to work, and then come home for Shabbat," says Abrahams, who has run a bed and breakfast with her husband, Arnie, since making aliyah to the area 2 1/2 years ago.

Shemen LaMeor will create jobs and reinvigorate the region's agriculture while preserving its unique character. "Kids here know how to plant, herd sheep, ride horses," Abrahams says. "They really have a very good feel for the land; they know how to lead a simple life."

Rabbi Veffer, a graduate of the University of Waterloo and creator of the KosherLamp, which has changed late-night Shabbat reading for religious families around the world, was associate rabbi of The Village Shul Aish HaTorah Learning Centre in Toronto before returning to Israel nearly four years ago.

Abrahams says they both wanted to help out by tapping into local resources that would otherwise be wasted. "A lot of the olive trees are actually abandoned, not picked, nothing's done with them.

"The area is blessed with abundance. Everyone's got citrus and passion fruit and olives... We're reclaiming the land, reclaiming the olives."



Nili Abrahams and Rabbi Shmuel Veffer show off local olives and trees in the Yavne'el area. [Shemen LaMeor photo]

Rich in Jewish history, the area around Yavne'el is where, according to the Book of Judges, the warrior Deborah led her battle against Canaanite general Sisera. It's also the site of the Golani tree, the oak tree symbolizing the legendary IDF brigade. Nearby Tiberias is considered the fourth-holiest city in Judaism, where the Jerusalem Talmud was written and the great teacher Maimonides is buried.

Shemen LaMeor has built relationships with farmers to secure 1,500 dunam (1.5 square kilometres) of land to prepare for its first picking season this fall. They will compensate some farmers with a tax receipt, others with a percentage of the oil for personal use or resale.

Abrahams says the organization welcomes volunteers, seminary and yeshiva students, and other willing groups, who will donate their labour for a morning or afternoon and learn how olives are picked and processed into one of Israel's purest, most ancient bounties.

"We'll press the oil for them on the spot... it'll be a great part of their visit to the north."

Together, they hope to extend the Jewish world's appreciation for Israel in its entirety. "I see this as a way of going beyond Jerusalem," says Abrahams. "Every single part of Israel is vital... to our existence.

"The abundance here is God-given. We don't want to waste that... so we're using the abundance for ohr, to spread the light of Torah around the world."

Jewish Agency steps in to aid Ukraine Jews

JTA

JERUSALEM — The Jewish Agency said it would offer immediate emergency assistance to the Jewish community of coup-ravaged Ukraine and help secure its institutions.

Jewish Agency Chairman Natan Sharansky's announcement on Saturday came hours after protests in the former Soviet republic forced President Viktor Yanukovych to flee Kiev and the parliament announced new presidential elections for late May. Dozens died in violent demonstrations leading to the coup.

Natan Sharansky

Some 200,000 Jews live in Ukraine, mostly in the capital of Kiev, according to the Jewish Agency.

The Jewish Agency will help Ukraine through its Emergency Assistance Fund for Jewish Communities, which enables Jewish communities at risk to strengthen security measures.

Sharansky said in a statement that Ukraine is "one of the most vibrant Jewish communities in the world, with dozens of active Jewish organizations and institutions. Recent events have shown that we must strengthen these institutions' security measures. We have a moral responsibility to ensure the safety and security of Ukraine's Jews."

He told Jewish Agency leaders on Saturday night that the organization is in "constant contact" with the Jewish leadership in Ukraine and is following events there closely.

Rabbi Moshe Reuven Azman, a Chabad rabbi in Ukraine, told Ma'ariv that he advised his congregation to leave Kiev and the country, if possible.

To aid the Jews of Kiev and other Jewish Ukrainian communities, relief efforts, including the delivery of food and other urgent necessities, have been expanded by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, an overseas partner of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Montreal's Federation CJA.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has launched the Jewish Ukraine Crisis Fund, with funds raised being allocated to the JDC and the Jewish Agency for Israel.

Oldest known Shoah survivor dies at 110

JTA

LONDON — Alice Herz-Sommer, the 110-year-old Holocaust survivor and concert pianist whose life was the subject of an Oscar-nominated documentary, has died.

Herz-Sommer, who was believed to be the oldest Holocaust survivor and was still playing the piano, died Sunday morning in London.

The Lady in Number 6: Music Saved My Life, the 38-minute film directed by Montrealer Malcolm Clarke about her life, is up for best short documentary at the Academy Awards to be handed out next month.

The film showed her indomitable optimism, cheerfulness and vitality despite all the upheavals and horrors she faced in life.

"I know there is bad in the world, but I look for the good," she told JTA in a brief telephone interview recently, and "music is my life, music is God."

Alice Herz-Sommer [YouTube screenshot]

Trained as a pianist from childhood, Herz-Sommer made her concert debut as a teenager, then married and had a son.

In 1943, however, Herz-Sommer and her husband, Leopold, and their six-year old son Raphael (Rafi), were transported to the Nazi model concentration camp Theresienstadt. Her husband died in the Nazi camp, but Herz-Sommer became a member of the camp orchestra and gave more than 100 recitals while protecting her son.

Liberated in 1945, Herz-Sommer and her son returned to Prague but four years later left for Israel. There she taught at the Jerusalem Academy of Music and performed in concerts frequently attended by Golda Meir, while her son became a concert cellist.

After 37 years in Israel, she followed her son to London in 1986. She remained in London even after her son died 15 years later at the age of 65.

Israel will help fund Diaspora Jewish education: Liberman

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Investing in Jewish education in the Diaspora is the best way to address the "demographic catastrophe" facing North American Jews, and Israel wants to help, Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Liberman said last week.

In a speech to the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations last week in Jerusalem, Liberman cited "Jewish continuity" as the most pressing issue affecting world Jewry and pledged that starting with its next budget, the Israeli government would invest $365 million annually – an amount to be matched by federations in the Diaspora – to improve the accessibility and affordability of Jewish education.

"For many years, Israeli officials have called on our brothers and sisters in the Diaspora… to donate your time, energies and funds to Israel," he said.

"However, I turn to you today and say that, while we are enormously and forever grateful for your assistance, we believe it is now time to concentrate on the challenges facing your own communities, especially those emanating from the dangerous trends in the Jewish community demonstrated in the recent survey."

Reacting to the Pew survey on American Jewry that documented an intermarriage rate as high as 58 per cent and found that 31 per cent of American Jews said they didn't feel attached to Israel, Liberman said he believes "that the antidote to this rising assimilation, intermarriage and disengagement is education.

"Today, unfortunately, Jewish children are being kept from the Jewish classrooms because of the exorbitant and prohibitive costs of Jewish education in the U.S. It cannot be, it should not be, that a Jewish child will not be able to receive a good Jewish education because of financial reasons."

He added that if this trend continues, "we will lose another six million Jews in a generation or two."

The commitment from the Israeli government, in partnership with Jewish federations in North America who are expected to match Israel's investment, "cannot become just another small project and needs to be the central point of partnership between us," Liberman said.

"This must become the most pressing issue on the global Jewish agenda. From my point of view, this is more pressing than any other issue, including the Palestinian negotiations or the Iranian nuclear threat."

Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said this paradigm shift that has the Israeli government investing in the Diaspora has been brewing for more than a decade.

"It is something I predicted would happen as the State of Israel matured and recognized its duty to the Diaspora – that if it invests in the Diaspora, it's really investing in itself," Sokolsky said.

"When you think about it, from 1948 on, the first 60 years was about building the State of Israel, and, now it's about building the people of Israel. In that endeavour, Israel can take the lead. Birthright was the first example of that. It was a groundbreaker in terms of the government of Israel investing hard-earned Israeli tax dollars into Jewish identity in the Diaspora. It was unheard of before then."

Despite Liberman's suggestion that Diaspora Jewish communities ought to focus their fundraising allocations on continuity efforts, Sokolsky said he doesn't believe Liberman was implying that funding for Israel is no longer necessary.

"I didn't read it that way at all," Sokolsky said, adding that Liberman's statements won't affect the amount of money the federation donates to Israeli causes, which stands at about 20 per cent of its annual campaign funds, or about $12 million a year.

UIA Federations Canada president and CEO Linda Kislowicz said the idea is that federations will continue to support Israel as they traditionally have in the past.

"But Israel has a role to play financially and otherwise in helping to strengthen Diaspora communities because we are one global Jewish People," Kislowicz said.

Sokolsky said he's hopeful that Liberman's education proposal could be in the works within the next three or four years.

"I think it will be realized. I think this is the first of many announcements, but it's going to take time," Sokolsky said, adding that federation would jump at the opportunity to be a part of this international Jewish education network.

"Our federation gives more than any other Jewish federation to Jewish education, so we have no problem matching what a fair share for Toronto would be. We put in $12 million a year to Jewish education already – $10 million of that is in subsidies for Jewish education. That's more than New York, Chicago, Miami, Baltimore, Boston and Los Angeles combined. No one comes close to what we put in. So we're happy to meet that challenge."

But, he added, "$700 million [a year] is probably not going to be enough to significantly lower the cost of Jewish education, but it would sure help."

What's most important about Liberman's announcement is that the Israeli government understands "that there is a strong and compelling need to invest strategically and financially in strengthening the education of Diaspora Jews and that is a wonderful thing," Kislowicz said.

"I think the message is that we need to be investing more aggressively… in strengthening Jewish education… and making Jewish education more affordable and more accessible to families and young people because… that's the foundation," she said.

Artistic director fired, season shut down

It's lights out at Winnipeg Jewish Theatre

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — In what can appropriately be described as a dramatic move, the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre (WJT) announced last week that it has fired artistic director Michael Nathanson and is cancelling Shiksa, by local playwright Cairn Moore, which was to be its final production of the current season.

Nathanson has headed the 26-year-old company for the past seven years.

Michael Nathanson

The Feb. 18 moves came as a result of declining attendance and finances. In a statement posted on its website, the board said that it's "examining our financial position and considering how we may proceed forward. We apologize to our patrons, supporters, donors and to all of the artists and theatre practitioners who have helped us grow over the years for this abrupt end to our season. We look forward to returning to the stage in the future."

The WJT board is not commenting on Nathanson's firing, which reportedly is the subject of litigation. He did not respond to The CJN's calls for comment.

WJT board president Judith Putter was hopeful that the shutdown is temporary. "The theatre is a precarious business," she said. "We hope we will be able to bounce back. We are working hard at finding a solution."

In a short report on the situation in the local Jewish Post and News, editor Bernie Bellan noted that "there was a fair bit of discontent from long-time theatregoers over the diminution of Jewish content. Season ticket sales especially had declined drastically in recent years."

The WJT was in its 26th season. When it was founded by music teacher Bev Aronovitch and a group of friends and supporters in 1987, it was the first new Jewish theatre in Canada in many decades. Its mandate was to present professional theatre of high artistic quality that reflects the Jewish experience of the past, present and future and to encourage the creation of new Canadian plays of Jewish interest.

The WJT started as a non-profit community theatre producing two plays a year. In 1992-93, WJT became a member of the Professional Association of Canadian Theatres, operating under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Theatre Agreement negotiated with the Canadian Actors' Equity Association.

In both the 1998-99 and 2000-01 seasons, attendance surpassed 6,000 tickets sold. Box office revenue surpassed $100,000 for the first time in 2000-01.

Nathanson was hired as artistic director for the 2006-07 season, succeeding longtime artistic director Kayla Gordon who left to pursue other ventures in the theatre world. A former Winnipegger, Nathanson had been living in the United States, where he was trying to make it as a playwright.

He came aboard at an earlier low point in the WJT's financial health. Over his first four seasons, the WJT enjoyed an artistic revitalization. Productions of Death of a Salesman in January 2008 and Lenin's Embalmers in October 2010 were the two best-attended shows of the past decade.

"Our shows enjoyed rave reviews and, despite competing with theatres whose budgets are between six times to 26 times as large, have been hailed as being as good as, if not the best, theatrical productions in Winnipeg," Nathanson told The CJN in 2012.

WJT was also the first theatre in Winnipeg in the past decade to have presented a new play – Nathanson's Talk – which was subsequently named a finalist for the Governor General's Award in Drama in October 2009. (Talk has since been staged by Toronto's Harold Green Jewish Theatre and at the National Arts Centre Festival in Ottawa and in Israel.

In the spring of 2012, Nathanson and the WJT staged the ambitious and costly Angels in America: Millenium Approaches. While the production received much critical praise, it lost money – as did Perestroika, which kicked off the theatre's 25th season the following fall.

Gordon, Nathanson's predecessor, said the WJT's precarious financial situation is not unusual. She was the WJT's artistic director for 11 years.

"Every couple of years, the board would say that we lacked the funds to stage a second or third show," she said. "But we always found a way to survive.

"It happens with other Jewish theatres as well. Such is life in small theatre with small audiences."

She said she hopes the current shutdown will be a temporary hurdle and that the theatre will be able to carry on.

Tibetan refugees get help in B.C.

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Sometime in the next few months two Tibetans will arrive in Vancouver from Arunachal Pradesh, in the far northeast of India.

When they arrive, a group from Vancouver's Congregation Or Shalom will be waiting for them, to aid with their resettlement in this country. The group, which calls itself the Momo Minyan, was formed in June 2013 with the purpose of helping these Tibetans create a new life in British Columbia. In February, they completed and filed the sponsorship papers. Now, they wait until the newcomers arrive.

"It means receiving them at the airport, finding a place for them to stay, ensuring they get registered for health benefits, helping them learn the language and find a job, and assisting them as they integrate socially," said David Berson, a member of the Minyan.

It promises to be no small undertaking.

"The Tibetans are amazing people, but they're very reserved and shy in their mannerisms," Berson said. "There's going to be big cultural differences."

Back in 2010, at the urging of the Dalai Lama, Prime Minister Stephen Harper agreed to allow 1,000 displaced Tibetans to resettle in Canada. To make the transition possible, though, each one required sponsorship by a Canadian group or individual. Vicki Robinson, a facilitator for the Momo Minyan, said Or Shalom is the first synagogue in Canada to sponsor Tibetans under this program. The Minyan has been working with the Canadian Tibetan Society and the United Church of Canada to get the applications completed.

"The United Church has a lot of experience in resettlement, working with the Canadian Immigration Committee and getting all the permits lined up," Berson said. "It makes you feel good, as a member of the Jewish community, to be partnering with interfaith communities also involved in this."

The group will be responsible for the Tibetans' entire integration package, including finding and paying for an apartment, paying for health insurance and food. "Until we know who we're absorbing, it's difficult to know what kind of work will be appropriate," he said. The refugees come from poverty stricken villages, but may be quite educated nonetheless.

The Minyan has begun fundraising in the Or Shalom community and will extend its efforts to the wider community when more is known about the particular immigrants they are sponsoring. The Canadian government estimates sponsorship cost at $12,000 per person per year but with the cost of living in Vancouver, that won't be enough, Berson said.

"It's guiding our efforts in terms of fundraising, but we think we'll need more than that. The government is very nicely providing them with landed immigrant status, but not any other aid, per se, in the process."

Members of the Momo Minyan united in a mutual agreement to participate in this humanitarian effort, one that resonated with many in the synagogue, Berson said. "The opportunity for us to be able to extend our hospitality to another group that has suffered exile and have a 'diaspora' is probably one element in why I got involved."

Party service encourages donations to charities

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

When Bonnie Levine's daughter, Jenna, was about to turn seven last fall, Levine wanted to make organizing the upcoming party easy, and she wanted to impart a lesson on the importance of doing good.

Levine had just become the first chief ambassador for Quebec and Eastern Canada for ECHOage, an online birthday party service that encourages donations to charities.

ECHOage was founded in 2008 by Torontonians Alison Smith and Debbie Zinman, a former Montrealer, mothers who were looking for a way to avoid the endless shopping for birthday gifts, while instilling in their kids the value of philanthropy. But they didn't want to take away the fun of the occasion by insisting that children forgo all gifts for the sake of charitable giving.

ECHOage (www.echoage.com) offers a similar service to that of other electronic invitation sites, providing cards and managing RSVPs, but with an important difference.

No presents are brought to an ECHOage party. Instead, monetary gifts are made through the website's secure system. The birthday child and the parents must commit to donating half of the total collected to one of the dozens of registered Canadian not-for-profit organizations that have endorsed ECHOage (others are also considered if they meet certain criteria, such as benefiting children or families).

The other half of the money is kept by the birthday girl or boy.

The charities benefit not only from the contributions, but also from exposure on the ECHOage site, which also offers marketing tools to help them reach supporters, Levine said.

Donors receive tax receipts for gifts of at least $15, although some charities issue them for less.

The party hosts pay a 4.9 per cent processing fee on the half that goes to charity. Other revenue for ECHOage is derived from charities paying a premium for better placement, for example, Levine said.

In her daughter's case, the 30 or so girls at her party gave a total of over $600. Jenna, who attends Akiva School in Montreal, turned over 50 per cent to the Montreal Children's Hospital Foundation and used the rest to buy a bicycle.

Levine notes that, in this way, children gain not only an awareness of needs in the community, but also experience in handling money. She adds that the ECHOage parties are environmentally friendly, eliminating the paper that would otherwise be used for invitations and wrapping. It also eliminates the inevitable waste of getting presents the child does not want, she said.

Over its five-year history, use of the ECHOage site has raised nearly $2.5 million for more than 250 charities in Canada and the United States, Levine said.

The service is well established in Toronto, Western Canada and many American cities, she said, and, although it has only been promoted in Montreal for a few months, already 100 such parties have been held in the city.

Quite a few Jewish community and Israel-based causes are partners, and more from Montreal are being added as Levine spreads the word.

Among them are at least five Toronto Jewish day schools and Jewish Family & Child; Mazon Canada; Save a Child's Heart; Na'amat Canada; Kadimah, Ramah, B'nai Brith and Harry Bronfman Y Camps; Ve'ahavta; Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation; Forever Chai Foundation of Canada; Kfar Yeladim David; One Family; and Montreal's Mada Community Centre.

In December, ECHOage expanded its service to include bar/bat mitzvahs and events for adults, whether birthdays, anniversaries or retirement parties. With grown-up parties, anywhere from 50 to 100 per cent of the gifts collected may be directed to the selected charity.

Being an ECHOage ambassador has been an ideal way for Levine, who also has a four-year-old daughter, to re-enter the work force, combining her interests in business and community.

Bonnie Levine

She holds a bachelor of commerce degree from McGill University and an MBA from HEC Montréal, and worked as a management consultant in Chicago for five years before returning to her native city.

Levine points out that her daughter and her daughter's friend, also in Grade 2 and celebrating a seventh birthday, were not passive recipients. They both worked to raise money for their favourite causes and to buy something they really wanted.

"This is the power of ECHOage – putting kids in the driver's seat and empowering them to play a more significant role in giving back. What better way than on the occasion of their birthday to say to the world that they want to see things happen in a better way and to do something meaningful," she said.

A New Psalm: The Psalms as Literature
Rabbi Benjamin Segal
Gefen Publishing House
and
Joy, Despair and Hope: Reading Psalms
Rabbi Edward Feld
Cascade Books

For believers, prayer may be the most basic religious activity. Moses Maimonides once described an initiative that would be doomed to failure by saying that it would be as difficult as trying to tell religious people that they are not allowed to pray. No one, he suggested, would listen.

Prayer in Judaism, goes back even to the days when animal sacrifices were offered in the Temple in Jerusalem. The biblical book of Psalms is the oldest collection of Jewish prayers, containing some that are almost 3,000 years old. Even today, much of the Jewish prayer book consists of excerpts from Psalms.

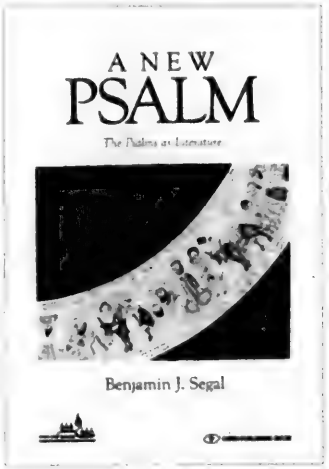
While the Torah (the five books of Moses) consists of God's communication to human beings, Psalms consists of human communication to God. No wonder Jews over the centuries turned to the book of Psalms for inspiration in times of joy or trouble. Finding the right words for addressing God is not easy, but using the hallowed words of the Psalmist helps.

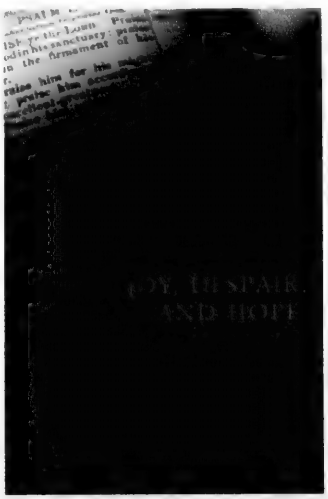
Many people, including some who live observant lives, have difficulty with prayer. The whole idea of talking to God, whether using our own words or traditional ones, and expecting God to hear (much less respond) is foreign to the modern mindset.

Two new books try to make the book of Psalms more accessible: A New Psalm: The Psalms as Literature, by Rabbi Benjamin Segal, and Joy, Despair and Hope: Reading Psalms, by Rabbi Edward Feld. Both authors are Conservative rabbis. They take different approaches, but both strive to make Psalms more relevant to contemporary readers.

Rabbi Segal's book is more complete. Just short of 700 pages, it provides the Hebrew text and an English translation for each one of the 150 chapters of Psalms, explaining the text in literary terms. He draws heavily on the scholarship of Jewish and Christian writers but fits them into a Jewish framework.

Rabbi Feld's much slimmer volume (151 pages) is harder to categorize. He discusses only 14 psalms at any length. And while he does deal with literary issues, the focus of his book is on making the psalms relevant to people who have difficulty with prayer and whose belief itself may be somewhat shaky. He writes very openly about his own struggles of faith. "The forgiving God is not close at hand to me. I know the judgmental universe but not the forgiving one." But he takes solace from the book of Psalms: "It is the knowledge that even the biblical poet waits – longs for and hopes – that allows my sense of God's absence to have religious legitimacy."





Despite the traditional claim that I mentioned above – that the Torah constitutes God talking to us, while in Psalms we talk to God – both authors emphasize that the distinction may be overstated.

The voice of God often appears in Psalms. For example, in Psalm 91, the speaker appears to be in need of protection from "the terror of the night, the flight of an arrow by daylight, the plague stalking in the dark, the scourge that may ravage at noon." The psalm finishes with a change of voice, when God, without being introduced, starts to speak: "Because he desired Me, I will rescue him/ I will raise him up for he knows My Name/ When he calls on Me, I will answer him/ I will be with him in distress." In other words, the book of Psalms can also "speak" to those who are uncomfortable with addressing God, since many psalms, like this one, climax in God addressing us.

Curiously, the two authors have very different readings of the last line of that psalm. Rabbi Segal translates it as "With length of days I will sate him and cause him to see My salvation," explaining that God is requesting patience from and trying to reduce the expectations of the supplicant who wanted to be protected. God is accordingly saying that salvation will be seen only in the fullness of time. Rabbi Segal writes that "Psalm 91 suggests a more nuanced faith... a critique of naiveté," a critique of the belief that we can expect God's protection from immediate danger.

Rabbi Feld, on the other hand, senses a more positive turn in the last verse of Psalm 91, which he translates as, "I will sate him with a full life and show him My salvation." In this understanding, God is promising even more than what was requested. The prayer was just for protection, but "God promises something that had not been mentioned or even alluded to earlier: the fullness of days, time. It is the fullness of time that is the ultimate reward... Only God's voice is able to assure the positive: length of days, peacefulness and bounty... The voice of God takes us to a place only God can reassure us about – the future... In imagining that future, the Psalmist offers the ultimate reassurance of prayer: the future contains hope, blessing will come."

Those who have no problems pouring out their voices in sincere prayer will presumably not need these books. But more skeptical Jews would find something of benefit in each of these thoughtful books.

BOOK SPOTLIGHTS YIDDISH WOMEN WRITERS

Editor Frieda Forman and translators Sylvia Lustgarten and Sam Blatt are slated to give "dramatic readings" at an upcoming book launch for The Exile Book of Yiddish Women Writers, a book (published in 2013) that features stories by 13 Yiddish women writers about their youth in Europe, Canada and America.

"We see women's lives open up in a way that we've never seen before," said editor Forman about the book's various short stories, novel excerpts, memoirs and personal essays, all written originally in Yiddish.

Recurrent themes include family life during a period of tumultuous change, participation in social and political movements, sexual awakening and the longing for independence, education and creative expression.

Marking International Women's Day, the launch is sponsored by the United Jewish People's Order, Toronto. Winchevsky Centre, 585 Cranbrooke Ave., Sunday March 2, 1-p.m. Free admission. 416-789-5502.

Names in the News: Perhaps you caught the first episode of the new cable-TV series 24 Hour Rental that began airing last week on Super Channel. It's "a bizarre dark comedy, a satire poking fun at all the violence and crazy things that go on on TV and movies," according to Ari Posner, who composes the background music for the show.

Originally from Winnipeg, the Juno-award-winning composer moved to Toronto in 1989 to study music at York University. He has been here ever since, creating scores for countless films and TV shows. Recently he and writing partner Amin Bhatia have been scoring the hit police drama Flashpoint.

His most challenging assignment? It might have been My Awkward Sexual Adventure, a romantic comedy that screened at the 2012 Toronto International Film Festival: "It had a lot of off-colour scenes in it, so figuring out a way to do music for it was often very tricky." But in general, "It's often whatever you're facing at the moment. Any new project is a blank slate. You're very often scratching your head at the beginning and saying 'How am I going to do this?'"

Posner and his wife have "lots of family roots" in Toronto, so he says he's not considering a move to Los Angeles. However, several years ago he and Bhatia were nominated for an Emmy Award and went to the ceremony. "I got a taste of the scene there – it was very tempting." www.arimusic.com

The Jewish contribution

Visiting Tampa Bay's historic legacy

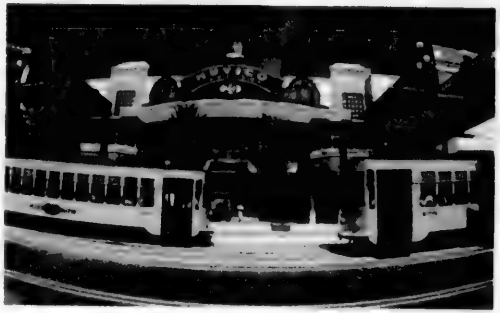
Maureen Littlejohn
Special to The CJN

Most snowbirds heading to Tampa Bay are looking for sun and a little poolside lounging, but for culture and history buffs, there's another fascinating activity that's easy to do – search out the area's Jewish roots.

In the city's historic district of Ybor City those roots are deep. "There were at least 90 different businesses owned by Jewish families. The biggest wave of Jewish immigrants came in the 1880s, and there was also a large boom in the 1910s. Some of the families are still in the Tampa Bay area," says Liz McCoy, curator of programs and education at the Ybor City Museum Society.

The best way to start your exploration is at the Jewish Roots of Ybor exhibit at the Ybor City Museum (until the end of 2014) on Ninth Avenue. Photos of families, founding groups, homes and businesses give visitors a fascinating glimpse into Tampa's Jewish community at the turn of the last century. Meeting in their homes, Ybor City Jews formed Congregation Schaarai Zedek in 1894.

In 1903 a split between Reform and Orthodox members resulted in the formation of the Orthodox Rodeph Sholom. Although the synagogues of both congregations are now in South Tampa and the old Jewish businesses have also left, the retail buildings remain. Ask at the museum for a map and audio unit for a self-guided tour, or sign up for a two-hour guided tour for $18.



The historic TECO Line streetcar and, at right, an archival photo of Max Argintar's menswear store which opened in 1908. It was the last of the Jewish-owned businesses to shut its doors in the district.

Walking the quaint brick streets, it's easy to get a feel for the way things used to be. The buildings still are dressed with decorative wrought iron balconies, and even though many have become nightclubs and restaurants, you just need to scan the top of the structures to see the original family name and year spelled out in contrasting concrete. Usually, Jewish families built their own retail outlets with living quarters on the upper floor. There are also historic plaques to help you find your way around.

Ybor City was stoked into existence by stogies. In the 1880s, Vicente Martinez-Ybor, a prominent Spanish-born cigar manufacturer, moved his cigar-making operation from Key West to some scrubland just northeast of Tampa. Other factory-owners followed and almost overnight, immigrants from Spain, Cuba, Germany and Italy arrived for jobs in the cigar trade. With this growth came opportunities for merchants.

Many Romanian Jews escaped from marginalizing laws in their home country and flocked to Ybor City where they started businesses specializing in everything from hats to housewares to clothing to groceries. Successful families included the Kaunitzs, the Argintars, Simovitzs, Kasriels, Wohls, Buchmans and Bobos.

"The Kaunitz family was the first Jewish retailer in the 1890s with the El Sombrero Blanco dry goods store. It was called El Sombrero Blanco because Isidore Kaunitz was known for wearing a white cowboy-style hat. He was very supportive to other Jewish immigrants, giving them jobs and helping them get loans to start up their own businesses," says McCoy.

Another bustling business was the Blue Ribbon Supermarket, owned by the Bobo family. "The matriarch, Sahla Bobo, took over the store in the 1950s. She had eight children, including boys, but she was in charge. She was a real feminist trailblazer and kept the store open until the 1990s," says McCoy.

Max Argintar's menswear store, which opened in 1908, was the last of the Jewish-owned businesses to shut its doors in the district in 2004.

Jaffa Road ready to hit the road

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

Toronto quintet Jaffa Road, known for songs that blend many of the world's most vibrant musical cultures, is planning to go on a world tour this summer, says founder Aaron Lightstone.

The tour will focus on compositions from the group's newest album, Where the Light Gets In, which received a Juno nomination and won the group the Canadian Folk Music Award for world music group of the year in 2013.

"We're hoping to get opportunities in Europe, Israel and the United States," says Lightstone, who plays oud, guitar and synthesizer for the group.

Lightstone is currently working out the dates and locations with an American touring company. The global exposure would allow the group to spread its influence beyond its niche audience in Canada.

"It's always exciting to have the opportunity to bring the music to new audiences," says Aviva Chernick, the group's entrancing lead singer, who is also currently working on a solo project.

Jaffa Road's music is a fusion of many musical cultures including Jewish, Arabic and Indian, alongside rock, pop, jazz and electronica. The group also brings traditional songs and prayers to a modern musical context.

Among the songs on Where the Light Gets In is a modern spin on the Jewish prayer Sim Shalom, and Avre Los Ojos, an updated version of a Turkish protest song originally recorded in 1907.

The mix of styles coming together fits a band from a multicultural centre like Toronto, Lightstone says.

"It's the natural sounds that we hear around us," he says. "It's only natural that curious musicians are going to start experimenting with blending them together."

Jaffa Road hopes to do some concerts in Canada leading up to the tour, Lightstone says.

Jaffa Road will perform at Temple Holy Blossom in Toronto in honour of Yom Ha'atzmaut on Monday, May 5. Some members of the group will join Chernick at a concert at Temple Sinai in June, which will feature a mix of her originals and Jaffa Road tunes.

The band also hopes to play in Yukon at the Dawson City Music Festival in July. Lightstone says the group has really enjoyed bringing its world-beat textures to northern, remote communities.

The five members of Jaffa Road are busy with their own side projects, which include teaching, music therapy and other musical endeavours, until the spring.

Chernick says that as a result, it's been hard to squeeze in time with her band-mates to practice.

"We usually get together only when we have something to play for," she says.

"That is the reality of being a musician in our society. It is rarely possible to do just that one project. They're multifaceted people with lots going on, but that also means it's a treat when we get to be together."

As for their victory at the Canadian Folk Music Awards, Chernick says the win was very unexpected.

"To get that acknowledgment and that recognition... even just to be nominated was very exciting," Lightstone says. "To actually win is just a really nice validation from our community of musical peers."

Jewish community numbers 30,000

While you're in Ybor City, hop on the historic TECO Line Streetcar right behind the museum. The bright yellow car chugs by Channelside's cruise terminal, dry dock and aquarium and then passes downtown landmarks including the hockey arena, stadium and art museum. The downtown area known as South Tampa has gone through a major transformation in the past years.

"There are 30,000 Jews living in Tampa and 46 per cent now live in South Tampa due to an urban revival," says Jack Ross, executive director of the Tampa Jewish Community Center. In order to service this population the JCC plans to transform Fort Homer Hesterly Armory, a 1930s architectural gem, into the area's beating heart.

The 10-acre property was an encampment for Teddy Roosevelt's "Rough Riders" at the outbreak of the Spanish American War and the Armory, dedicated the day after Pearl Harbor was attacked, has staged shows for performers including Elvis Presley and James Brown. Martin Luther King spoke there, as did John F. Kennedy in 1963, four days before his assassination. In 2012 the Tampa Jewish Community Centre signed a 99-year lease with an option to buy the 75,000 sq. ft. building.

Now it is set to become the Jewish Community Center South Campus. Originally located in South Tampa, the JCC relocated to a 21-acre North Campus when people were moving to the suburbs in the 1960s. Now there is enough demand for two separate locations.

"We've given great consideration to the conservation of this historic landmark, which we will revive and restore," says Ross. The city plans to relocate its fine arts centre within the complex, and the Tampa General Hospital plans to sublet space for a health and wellness centre.

"The South Campus will have the usual education and fitness components, but it's also going to be a premiere event centre," says Ross, adding, "almost half of our $20 million budget has been raised." The biggest pledges came from Bryan Glazer, co-chair of the Tampa Bay Buccaneers, who committed $4 million, and Tampa Bay Lightning owner Jeff Vinik's family, which pledged $1.5 million. Ross hopes to see the doors open in 2016.

From Ybor City's roots to South Tampa's urban revival, Jewish spirit has contributed significantly to Tampa Bay making it a destination with so much more to see than sun and sand

'PURPOSE COACH' HELPS WORKERS FIND THEIR 'WHY'

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

All working Canadians know what they do for a living, and most know how they do it. However, other than generating profit for the company they work for, not all of them find meaning in their work or know the true reason behind it.

Stephen Shedletzky, a "purpose coach" from Toronto, is motivated to inspire other Canadians to find their "why," the reason that drives them to live a peaceful and fulfilled life, and apply it to their work.

The "why" behind Shedletzky's coaching work is to help create a world where most people wake up every day excited to go to work and come home in the evening fulfilled by the job they've done.

A Gallup poll found that 70 per cent of all professionals in the United States aren't "highly engaged," meaning they don't enjoy what they do or find meaning in their work.

"That's terrible," Shedletzky told The CJN. "We spend 98,000 hours, on average, working in our lifetime. I feel that we ought to enjoy it. But the current reality is most people are cracking the whip as opposed to working together to figure out what's the cause of this organization beyond just profit."

Shedletzky, 26, speaks with ordinary people to help them find happiness and purpose in the work they do. He also makes presentations to dozens of companies each year, hoping to inspire and make workers think about the things that bring their lives meaning.

Since many people are disengaged, they don't think it's possible to aspire to anything great, Shedletzky says. Many of his group talks are about helping people operate at their best, which often comes from caring for others and working as a team.

"It's all about purpose and community," he explains. "The value of networking is not how many people can you meet. It's about how many people you can introduce to others."

Stephen Shedletzky

In 2011, Shedletzky founded InspirAction, an organization designed to inspire people to lead with purpose. He also works as a freelance consultant for Simon Sinek, the best-selling author who popularized the "Start With Why" concept that Shedletzky works with. Sinek's TED Talk about the concept is currently the second-most-watched talk in the conference's history.

Like Sinek, who is one of his mentors, Shedletzky is a poised, confident speaker, which makes it surprising to discover that he had a stutter as a boy and a fear of public speaking for many years.

"I never saw myself as a kid that could actually go up and entertain people or engage people," he says.

As a student at the University of Western Ontario, Shedletzky took a class called "Advanced Presentation Skills," taught by professor Denis Shackel. After showing his class Martin Luther King Jr.'s iconic "I Have a Dream" speech, Shackel told his students to prepare and deliver a speech with the same rousing passion as King on any topic of their choice.

The next class, Shedletzky stood up in front of his peers to talk about growing up with a stutter and his journey with the Speech & Stuttering Institute to overcome a fear of public speaking.

"[That class] was the first time in my life that I finally spoke about something that was more important than me," he says. "I finally had a message, something where I could show up to serve others. And it was the most alive and fulfilling experience that I had had in my life."

Public speaking isn't just something Shedletzky overcame with training and commitment. It's now one of his greatest strengths.

"[Shackel] taught me that everyone ought to do the things that light us up," he says. "Each person's definition of success ought to be their own definition."

Shedletzky can also relate to the life of a bored, cubicle drone, as he had a dreary two-year stint working in the corporate consulting world. Much of his day-to-day work was focused on helping companies maximize profits rather than helping their employees become more enriched and motivated.

He describes this workplace life as "a toxic environment where people walk around with cortisol in their veins and they're slowly dying… and I was."

In this search for meaning, Shedletzky found happiness as a motivational coach. He trained with the Coaching Training Institute (CTI) beginning in June 2011, shortly before he started InspirAction and working with Sinek's team. Shedletzky says he hopes to work as a purpose coach and continue to inspire people for the rest of his life.

InspirAction™

One of the ways to create happiness is to volunteer, Shedletzky says. By helping a cause and doing something in line with one's strengths, people don't only get energy, but they make personal connections and friends that make them feel more fulfilled.

Another way he became inspired was speaking with his grandfather, whom he refers to as Zaide Ben.

Ben Shedletzky was a successful butcher who survived the Shoah. During the war, he lived in a ghetto, hid in the Polish countryside and fought against the Nazis. Still healthy at age 97, Ben remains a role model to his grandson.

"My zaide is great because he inspired me with the message that we ought to work together to serve others and look out for people in our tribe," Shedletzky says.

"What we know about human beings is that if we're faced with hardship, it's those who co-operate, who work together, that survive and thrive."

Community has lost much more than a mashgiach

Kosher Living
Richard Rabkin

A few years ago, I took my wife out for dinner to the Park Hyatt's Anona restaurant for our wedding anniversary. About halfway through our meal, I saw a dapper man visiting each table, engaging the patrons in conversation. At first, I wondered if he was employed by the Park Hyatt, and then I thought that perhaps he was just a popular member of the Jewish community.

When he arrived at our table, I soon realized that he was both. He was the Park Hyatt's COR mashgiach, and he was Rabbi Leiby (Larry) Newman, beloved member of the Toronto Jewish community. Sadly, both COR and the Toronto Jewish community are mourning the loss of our beloved Leiby after his tragic and sudden passing.

Leiby Newman began working for COR approximately five years ago when we were looking to fill the role of a senior event mashgiach. We define an "event" as a kosher function taking place at a non-kosher venue such as a hotel, a museum, a golf course or the like.

An event mashgiach requires a special skill set because of the unique kashrut challenges inherent in creating kosher environments in non-kosher settings. He or she needs to have a strong knowledge of Halachah, the confidence to enforce the rules, a talent for problem solving, and perhaps most importantly, the ability to relate to people of different backgrounds and gain their respect. Rabbi Leiby Newman had all of these attributes. And more.

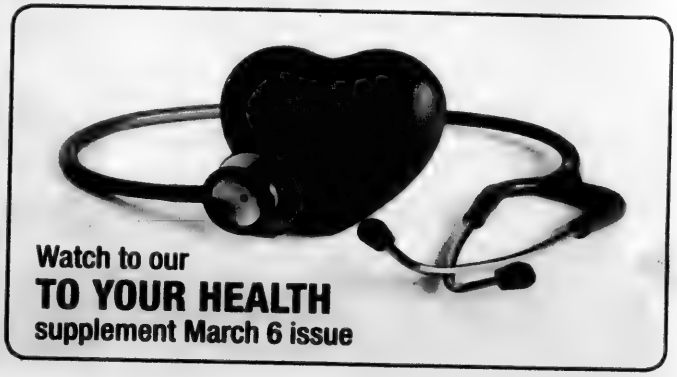
At Leiby's shivah, one of the caterers related a telling story. He was once catering an event where Leiby was serving as the mashgiach. A good mashgiach usually has a sense of when something is amiss, and Leiby had that sixth sense in spades. He decided to check one of the ovens, and sure enough, meat and fish had mistakenly been placed in the oven, cooking together at the same time. This is not permitted by Jewish law, as anyone setting a table for a Shabbat meal will tell you when they put out a fish plate and cutlery along with a meat plate and cutlery.

The natural instinct of most people would have been to sound the alarm and take the fish and meat dishes out of the oven immediately. Not Leiby. First, he pulled aside the caterer and discussed the problem with him. Then, he quietly took out the food and wrapped it up for the non-Jewish wait staff to take home later. Finally, he discreetly spoke to the non-Jewish chef who had made the honest mistake, and explained to him the prohibition of cooking meat and fish together. Not only was Leiby a good mashgiach, he was also a mensch.

As if COR wasn't fortunate enough to get one standout mashgiach when we hired Leiby, we actually got two. But in the second case, it was really a mashgichah – Leiby's wife, Mindy. As Rabbi Daniel Korobkin of the BAYT pointed out at Leiby's funeral, Leiby and Mindy were the perfect team. To their friends, it was either Leiby and Mindy or Mindy and Leiby because they were always together. And at many COR events that required two mashgichim, it was no different. Leiby and Mindy were like the dynamic duo of kashrut.

For Leiby, being a mashgiach was more than just a job – it was a calling. He received his rabbinical ordination at a young age, but didn't practise as a rabbi during his professional career. Perhaps it is for that reason that when the opportunity to work at COR came up, he jumped at the chance because he wanted to give back to the Jewish people in a spiritual way. To ensure that Jewish people were eating kosher food – to Leiby there was nothing nobler than that.

Both COR and the larger Toronto Jewish community have lost a great man that we will not be able to replace. May Leiby find peace in his eternal resting place.



Chocolate makes the world go around

Randy Fingrut
Special to The CJN

Chocolate has made people blissfully happy for hundreds of years. I would wager you never met a good piece of chocolate that you did not like. It has a creamy, sensual texture and a deeply gratifying taste.

In addition, chocolate triggers an overall euphoric experience. That's why it is considered to be a romantic food. Giving a gift of chocolate can be interpreted as an expression of passion. Why does chocolate create such magic? Chocolate contains a chemical called phenylethylamine, which is an endorphin. This chemical has been linked to those dizzying feelings associated with romance.

These feelings can include a greatly elevated mood, sense of excitement, attraction and pleasure, and can result in your falling in love. Even if you happen not to be in a relationship or when no one understands you, chocolate is always there.

When it comes to chocolate and the heart, the emphasis should be on dark chocolate. Dark chocolate has some potential heart-healthy advantages beyond that of happiness and love. Dark chocolate is rich in a group of antioxidants called flavanols. In small amounts, this ingredient is said to lower blood pressure, increase vascular health overall, improve LDL cholesterol and could improve cognitive function. So go ahead! Treat yourself with these amazing chocolate desserts. Even if you think that chocolate doesn't make the world go around, it certainly makes the ride more worthwhile!

BAILEY'S IRISH CREAM CHOCOLATE TRIFLE

This rich and delicious layered dessert is a bit of heaven. I recently prepared it for my grandson's first birthday party and I already have "orders" from family to make it again. This trifle is even better when prepared the day before serving.

1 Bailey's Irish cream chocolate cake, prepared ahead (recipe follows)
1 recipe of Bailey's Irish cream chocolate mousse (recipe follows)
500 ml whipping cream 35 per cent milk fat
1/4 cup Bailey's Irish Cream
8-10 oz. bittersweet chocolate, chopped finely. Reserve 1/4 cup of chocolate for the garnish.

Trifle Assembly

Whip cream to stiff peaks and then combine in the liqueur.

With a sharp knife or dental floss, slice the cake horizontally into three sections, then cut each section into 8 pie wedge-shaped pieces. Place the 8 sections of the cake on the bottom of a large clear glass bowl or trifle dish

Cover with one third of the mousse, one third of the whipped cream and one third of the chopped chocolate. Repeat with cake wedges, mousse, whipped cream and chopped chocolate two more times or until the bowl is full to the top. Garnish with the remaining chocolate.

To wrap, insert 6 wooden skewers into the trifle around the edge of the bowl. Drape two pieces of plastic wrap in different directions over the skewers and then use other pieces of plastic wrap around the skewers and around the dish. Keep refrigerated.

BAILEY'S IRISH CREAM CHOCOLATE CAKE

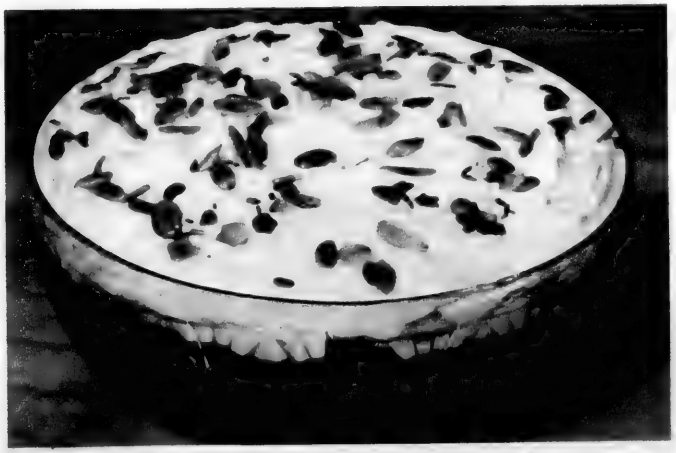
1 cup sugar
1 cup brown sugar
1/2 cup butter or margarine
2 eggs
1 1/4 cups skim milk
1/4 cup Bailey's Irish Cream liqueur, or other liqueur
1 tsp. baking soda
2 cups flour
3 squares unsweetened chocolate, melted and cooled

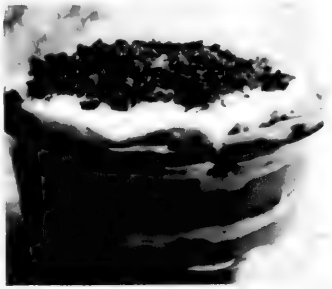
Preheat oven to 350.Using a food processor, cream together the sugars and butter. Add in the eggs, milk and liqueur. Pulse in baking soda and flour. Finally add the cooled chocolate and pulse until there are no streaks in the batter. Prepare a 9-inch spring form pan with a circle of parchment paper on the bottom and spray with canola oil. Pour in batter and bake for 40 to 50 minutes or until a test with a toothpick in the centre of the cake comes out clean. Cool and remove from spring form pan.

BAILEY'S IRISH CREAM CHOCOLATE MOUSSE

500 ml whipping cream, 35 per cent
1/4 cup Bailey's Irish Cream Liqueur, or other liqueur
2 boxes (113 grams each) instant pudding mix, chocolate flavour
3 cups skim milk

In a large bowl, using a hand held mixer or stand mixer, whip the cream until it stands in soft peaks. Add in the liqueur and whip until combined. In a separate bowl, using the same beaters, mix together the pudding mix and the milk. Whip the mixture for two minutes, scraping down the sides of the bowl occasionally. Fold the whipped cream into the pudding mixture a bit at a time until all combined and without any streaks.





CRISPY CRUNCH CHOCOLATE BAR COOKIES

These double chocolate cookies are so amazing you will wish you knew how to make them years ago.

50 g dark chocolate (1/2 of 100 g bar)
1/2 cup butter or margarine, softened
1/2 cup dark brown sugar
1/3 cup granulated sugar
1 large egg
1 tsp. vanilla extract
3 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder
1/2 tsp. baking soda
1/2 tsp. salt
1 cup all-purpose flour
3 1/2 bars (100 grams each bar) *assorted chocolate bars, coarsely chopped

In a small microwave-safe dish, melt the 50 grams of chopped chocolate on medium for 30 seconds. Stir. Microwave 15 to 30 seconds more or until chocolate is softened. Stir until smooth and let cool.

In food processor, blend butter until creamy. Add brown and granulated sugar and continue blending until mixture is light and fluffy. Combine in the egg and vanilla, then add in the cooled chocolate.

Add cocoa, baking soda, salt and flour using gentle pulses until combined.

Mix in chopped chocolate. Remove to a bowl, then cover and refrigerate until firm, about 4 hours or overnight.

Preheat oven to 350. Cover three baking sheets with parchment paper.

Using a mini ice cream scoop or your hands, shape dough into 1 inch balls and place about 2 inches apart on prepared baking sheets. Cookies will spread out during baking.

Bake 12 to 14 minutes. Place baking sheets on wire racks to cool. Do not remove cookies from the parchment paper until they are cool.

*Note: chocolate bars can be the same dark chocolate as in the batter, or you can mix them up, for example, using one milk chocolate, one with peanuts or raisins or one white chocolate. Every batch can produce totally different cookies.

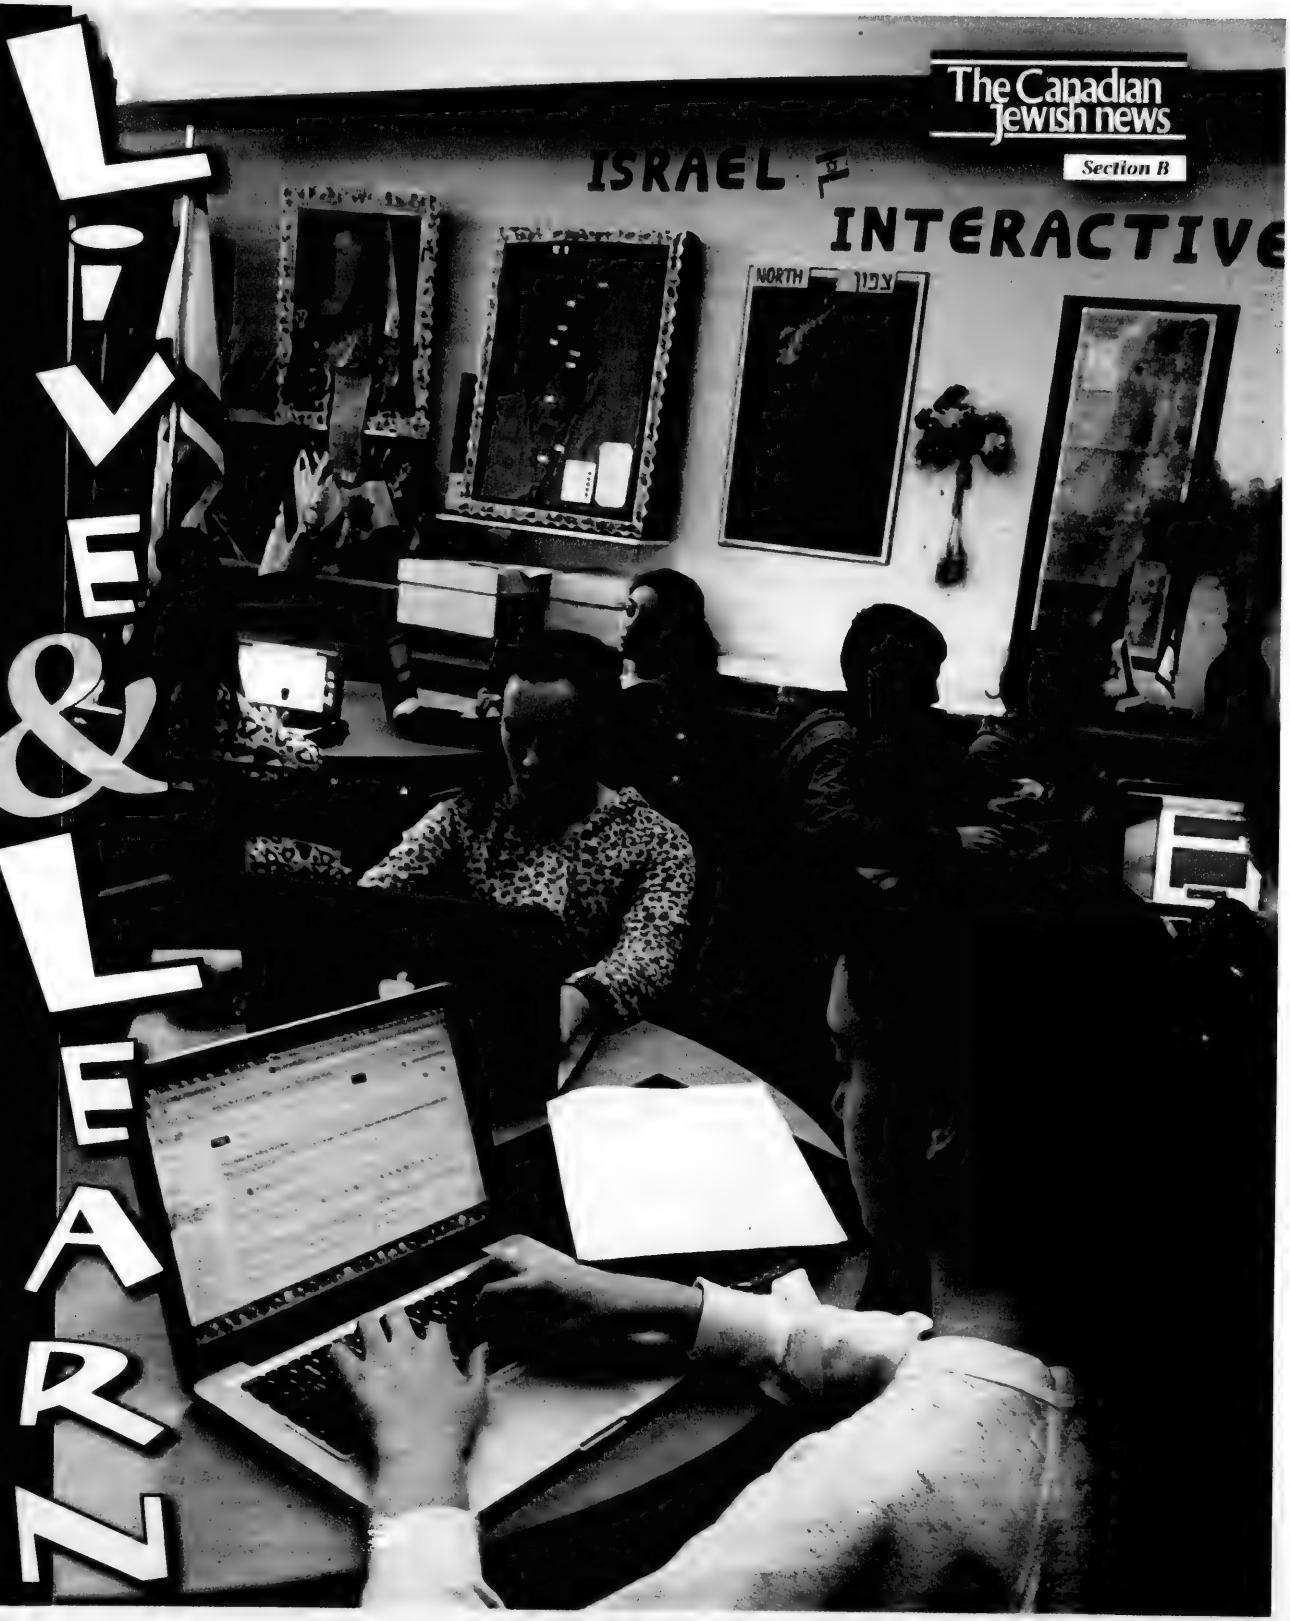
LIVE & LEARN



Bialik students connect with Israeli peers

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

A program at Bialik Hebrew Day School that connects Grade 6 students with their Israeli counterparts helps them form meaningful relationships with their peers in the Holy Land, said Nurith Sela, director of Bialik's Israel Interactive Centre.

"It's a collaborative learning project where they learn here and in Eilat about the same things, and they share their learning using the Internet," she explained. "You're not learning about the world, you're learning with the world."

The way it works is Bialik teachers and the teachers at Etzion Gaver School in Eilat all run discussions with students in which they try to impart the message of being responsible citizens of the world – an idea based on Jewish values.

"We are guests here [on Earth] and we should take care of it not just for us but for generations to come," Sela said.

The students have to identify problems in the world that demonstrate environmental irresponsibility and propose solutions for those issues, she explained.

"Then, they have to come up with a message they'd like to share with the world based on what they learned as a Jewish value."

The Israeli and Canadian students work together to brainstorm possible solutions. Each Bialik student is partnered with an Israeli student, with whom they interact throughout a five-week period.

Each one discusses local environmental concerns so that the students can determine which issues are strictly local, and which have a more global effect. For example, Sela said, some of the Eilat students might talk about polluting the sea, which might not come up if the Bialik students only discussed amongst themselves.

When posting online, students are limited to discussing the lessons and related issues. Sela emphasized that the online discussion forum is focused on learning, but if the students want to be in touch they send each other letters through snail mail.

The Canadian students write in English, while the Israelis write in Hebrew. In order to ensure they understand each other, the students might include translations of some of the more difficult words.

The program to connect Bialik students with Israelis began in 2011, with a school in Jerusalem, during which Grade 3 students here and in Israel corresponded with each other throughout the school year.

A year later, Bialik expanded the program to work with students in Eilat as well.

Bialik Hebrew Day School students correspond with students from Etzion Gaver School in Eilat on a collaborative learning project.

Sela said that the Eilat school was added to the program partly because Toronto is one of Eilat's sister cities, but also because the school has a heavy focus on environmental studies.

"We are a green school so it works well with us," Sela said. Bialik has been certified an Ontario EcoSchool, meaning it uses and teaches practices that are environmentally friendly.

Beyond looking at global vs. local issues, partnering up the students means they're able to make a friend across the ocean. In Israel, they get to learn about Jews living in the Diaspora, while the Canadians form closer ties to Israel, now that they have a friend there.

The last program ran in November 2012, coinciding with Operation Pillar of Defence, the eight-day Israeli military operation in Gaza, so the Canadian students mailed letters of support.

"They were thrilled," Sela said, adding that most of the kids come from a lower socioeconomic status, so some of them have never left Eilat, let alone left the country. "It's a fantastic opportunity for them to connect with other Jewish people in the world."

This year, however, they arranged the program to run alongside Tu b'Shvat, marking the Jewish New Year for trees, so that it would integrate well into the curriculum.

"It's not just a project, it's a wonderful relationship between that school and our school," Sela said. "I have a great feeling it'll develop more and more."

An Open Call to Open Hillel

Isaac Kates Rose
Special to The CJN

"Never. Not in a million years," said my friend, an educator working for Hillel of Greater Toronto, as he folded his arms.

"Breaking the Silence would never be welcome in this Hillel. We'd never allow it."

I could not follow his logic. Ten feet from where we stood were several Israel Defence Forces (IDF) veteran combatants who had been invited to my campus to share their experiences with students. Yet Breaking the Silence, an organization of IDF soldiers who seek to "expose the Israeli public to the reality of everyday life in the occupied territories" by sharing their experiences, is beyond the pale.

"People just won't get it," he explained. Those five words speak volumes to the reality of Hillel today, and are testament to the deep need for Hillel to respond to the brave leadership of the Open Hillel movement, which seeks to make Hillel more inclusive of all viewpoints.

It is a sign of a dynamic community that these debates are ongoing, that the walls of the oft-invoked "big tent" are flapping from the ruckus within. It demonstrates that my peers and I hold a stake in determining the future of that tent, and reminds me that the suggestions I have are rooted in a deep conviction that the tent can handle this plurality of opinions.

Indeed, the many voices in which we speak are not merely our greatest strength, they are what keep the tent aloft. As such, I am always appreciative of the mutual respect, active listening, and compassion that govern those conversations, even conversations where the two of us disagree vehemently.

Isaac Kates Rose

There is perhaps no subset of people more eager to question than Jewish university students.

Hillel, the sage, was the greatest exemplar of never turning away from a question. The Talmud tells us that Hillel implored the inquisitive "heathen" to "ask all the questions you have to ask." Even after the visitor has bombarded Hillel with banal questions about round-headed Babylonians, Hillel's ire is not provoked, and his commitment to discussion is unshaken.

What then do those Jewish students make of their eponymous home on campus deeming certain questions off-limits, unacceptable, and constituting a barring of doors?

Because of a refusal to engage with certain questions, the opportunity to question ourselves is lost. When it comes to the growth that emerges in conversation, even around difficult topics like Israeli policy, my friend, the Hillel educator, is right: "People just won't get it."

If we place a value on our future leaders carving out space for a relationship with Israel in their Jewish identity, then we must ask of ourselves, what kind of relationship are we really seeking? One that is personal, that has been cultivated in communication, with the entirety of a person's experiences, interactions, and ideals?

One that is dynamic and evolves in real time, never settles into comfortable passivity, but instead seeks to engage with and overcome challenges? One that, responding to those challenges, is responsible, and is built on a steadfast dedication to actualizing the truth of one's Jewishness and consistently conscious of the myriad other voices to which it is connected?

Building relationships with Israel that exist tucked away in a corner of a young Jewish person's self – untouched, sequestered – does a disservice to our tradition.

Ultimately, if the deepening and fulfillment of one's distinct Jewish identity is one of Hillel's goals, then Hillel must declare publicly and proudly that there is not one correct relationship to Israel because there can not be one correct Jewish identity. All Jewish identities must always be welcome to participate in this great conversation of our people.

I dream of a Hillel that on Israel/Palestine, and on all topics, models the kind of courageous conversations that campus and indeed all communities need – a Hillel that is a leader in combating all forms of discrimination and oppression, that champions a broad discourse, and ensures a plurality of voices while always noting which are absent.

My dreams for Israel are the same. For the sake of my generation of Jewish dreamers, I urge my Hillel to reaffirm its unwavering dedication to the community whose strength is its courageous conversations. I urge my Hillel to open.

Isaac Kates Rose is a University of Toronto Jewish studies student. He is also the Hashomer Hatzair national youth director.

Israeli educator promotes Jewish studies in a cultural way

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Ariel Picard, director of education for the Be'eri program at the Shalom Hartman Institute in Israel, was in Toronto last month to speak with various Jewish community leaders and educators about the program's goal to teach Jewish values and culture in the Israeli secular school system.

Rabbi Picard, who was ordained by the Israeli Chief Rabbinate, has a doctorate in philosophy from Bar-Ilan University and conducts research in contemporary Jewish law, spoke with The CJN about his five years as the director of the Be'eri program and how its strategy can be applied to Toronto's Hebrew day school system.

"The program started eight years ago, and the program is introducing Jewish studies and culture in non-religious Israeli schools," Picard explained.

"We work with these schools, because for many, many years, they had very little Jewish education in the schools, and that was wrong, because Israeli kids were growing up being ignorant of any Jewish knowledge. Of course, they know Hebrew and they know Bible a little bit, but it wasn't deep and important in their lives."

Picard said the program is changing that now, as it has become part of the Israeli Ministry of Education's official curriculum.

"We work with 125 schools across the country... It's a holistic program. You have the books, the curriculum, the teacher training, and we have facilitators, a team of 25 scholars; men and women, who in the past were teachers in schools in Israel, but also knowledgeable about Judaism. They come to visit the schools every two or three weeks and work with the teachers."

Rabbi Ariel Picard, director of education for the Be'eri program.

Integrating the Be'eri program into the established education system did not meet with any resistance, he said, because the facilitators of the program offer Jewish studies in a cultural way.

"It's not religious studies. It's Jewish studies. It's not the same. It's not about the rules and practice, although this is part of it," Picard explained.

Shift the focus to Jewish values

"It's more about values and relevant issues, relevant for day-to-day life, in family relationships, relationships between individuals and a group, environmental issues, social justice – all these kinds of relevant issues and dilemmas that people are facing. We are teaching them through Jewish texts."

Since the program has been so successful in Israel, Picard believes it can work just as well in the Diaspora.

"In North America, or Toronto, every Jewish school has its own agenda, and there is not a lot of contact between the schools… [But] the model, not only the technical model, but the ideology of the Be'eri program can be used also in Toronto," he said.

"Not everyone is interested in the religious part of Judaism, but the cultural part, the value system of Judaism, is interesting and meaningful to everybody, because it is a language and a culture you can use to confront, discuss, to argue on things that are important to you and the community you live in. Shifting the focus to this is an important thing to do in North America."

Picard said while North American Jewish communities can benefit from the Be'eri program, he thinks Israeli educators and leaders can learn from the Diaspora.

"There is a lot that we, Israelis, can learn from your communities. Every time I come here, I'm so impressed by your communities… by the energy, by the vibrant, dynamic communities in North America," he said.

"The sense of community responsibility is very strong here, and we in Israel have something to learn from it, because it's a Jewish state, but on the way to a Jewish state, we forgot the community."

Picard added that although he recognizes that each community and the Jewish schools within each community have their own identities and ideologies, "it would be wrong just to ignore that we are one, big Jewish community and the differences are smaller than what we have in common, especially in the realm of Jewish education.

"What I see here in schools in North America is that each school introduces its own curriculum and is writing the book from the beginning. There is not enough sharing, of discussing common issues," he said.

Acknowledging the differences between Israel's public school system and Toronto's private Jewish day school system, Picard said he understands that it's more of a challenge for Jewish educators and administrators here to collaborate.

"But I think it is vital. We all stood at Sinai to get the Torah. So we have the same Torah. Maybe we have different interpretations – that's fine. But there is so much in common, and especially in education, that can be shared between us," he said.

"If a school will share its curriculum and its methodology, and will share common interests, will have dialogue about the challenge of Jewish education, I think that could be very good for the community."

When it comes to enticing Israeli-Canadians to become more engaged in Jewish life and the Jewish day school system, Picard gave an example of a successful program in Israel that he believes could be just as successful here.

"In five different towns, we hold a contest, a song contest. The process involves a well-known Israeli singer and a scholar from the Hartman Institute. They take a group of high school kids from that city, and in the process of three months, they are learning together Jewish sources, and from those sources, the kids write songs and music," he said.

"These kids found that they can use Judaism as inspiration for their own creativity and that can be done here as well."

Picard said that if Israeli kids can see that Jewish texts can be a source of creativity or the basis for discussions on topics that are relevant to their everyday lives, they may be more open to learning about Jewish values.

"If you're not interested in the synagogue life or in rituals, you have to do something that is really important for you, and that's culture, or values, or relevant issues which are part of our lives. I think this is a message that can work very smoothly with Israeli kids here in North America, in the same way that it works in Israel."

Tax credits reduce day school tuition pain

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

For middle class families struggling to make a choice about whether to invest in Jewish day school, the five-figure price tag is often the source of their hesitation.

As Gail Baker, the outgoing head of school for the Toronto Heschel School recently told The CJN, "People are selecting to not even come through the doors and when you ask them, it's, 'No, I'd love to, but it's just to expensive.' They won't even start to entertain that possibility.'"

The tuition fees – upward of $11,000 per child, per year (assuming a family doesn't qualify for a tuition subsidy) – can be intimidating. But what many people often forget is that once you factor tax credits into the equation, the actual cost of a day school education can drop by as much as 40 per cent.

Andrea Benaim, 32, a chartered accountant, said there are three tax breaks that families can potentially take advantage of if they enrol their children in Jewish day school.

"There's a donation credit, child care expense credit if they're attending nursery or daycare, and in some cases, medical expenses would apply," Benaim said.

The donation credit is for the religious portion of the curriculum at day schools that are registered as charities. Benaim said the tax credit comes from both the federal and provincial governments.

"Let's say your kid is going to a private Jewish school and you get a donation receipt for $10,000. Let's assume that's the full amount that you pay for tuition, and you're getting a donation receipt for the full amount. The federal side is a 15 per cent credit on the first $200 of your donation and 29 per cent over and above $200, up to 75 per cent of your net income," she said.

"So that's $30 [on the first $200], and then on the remaining $9,800, you get 29 per cent, which results in a credit of $2,842. There's the provincial side also. You get 5.05 per cent on the first $200, and then 11.16 per cent anything over and above $200. If you work with the same example, you get a credit of $1,103.

"Putting both of those together, if your tuition is $10,000, you're getting back about $4,000. So that would result in just over $6,000 that you're actually paying."

Jewish day schools in Toronto operate differently from one another, allowing some to issue donation receipts for 100 per cent of the tuition paid, while others can only issue receipts for a portion of the fees. The amount depends on a number of factors, including the portion of their curricula devoted to religious studies and the amount of private donations they get to cover the operating costs for the secular parts of their curricula.

Mayeer Pearl, a chartered accountant who heads Associated Hebrew Schools' admissions and tuitions committee, said the donation receipt percentage at Associated, which has been around 65 per cent over the past few years, is calculated by the school's auditors.

He said Associated parents with children enrolled in grades 1 to 8 paying full tuition – around $14,000 – can expect to get 30 per cent back.

The donation receipts for junior and senior kindergarten tuition, which runs about $13,000, is around 80 per cent. That means parents paying full tuition can expect a refund of more than $4,000.

"Unfortunately, it's a huge up-front expense," Pearl said, but the donation receipt "will provide a refund to you on your income tax return or a reduction in your tax return by approximately 30 per cent… of the tuition that you're paying."

Andrea Benaim

However, parents who get subsidies from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto won't get as much of a refund, he said.

"If you're a subsidized parent, your tuition receipt is reduced by the amount of your subsidy," Pearl explained.

"If your tuition is $14,000 and you're paying $10,000, your donation receipt is going to be reduced by $4,000. We have to take that part off first, because someone else is paying that on your behalf, whether it's the school or federation," he said.

"If you're a subsidized parent that gets a $10,000 subsidy, you'd pay the school $4,000 and you wouldn't get a donation receipt at all."

Benaim said for parents who are paying for nursery or day care, whether at a private Jewish institution or not, a donation receipt would not be issued, but parents are able to claim daycare fees as a child care expense.

"If you're paying for nursery or daycare, that would be a deduction from your net income," she said.

"Typically, the fees that you're paying for daycare would go against your net income. That would put you in a different tax bracket," likely resulting in a refund.

"Sometimes Jewish day school tuition can be claimed as a medical expense if it's a medical necessity for a child. For example, if you have a child enrolled in pre-school at Zareinu, a Jewish school that has medical equipment and offers medical care and personnel to look after the kids, in that case you'd get a medical expense credit," Benaim explained.

"You just have to make sure to ask for those receipts so you have them."

Students seeing skilled trades as viable career option

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

A few months ago, Canada's Citizenship and Immigration Minister Chris Alexander was the guest at an event at the Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

The minister was asked questions on a broad range of topics, including job prospects for young people. To the astonishment of many, the minister suggested directing young people to a trade. Something like welding.

As the audience looked at their friends with a what's-he-talking-about look on their faces, Alexander pointed out that a welder right out of school can expect to earn $150,000 per year. An experienced welder, a master of his craft, can top out closer to $500,000, he said.

Which brings to mind a conversation with a plumber who attended our former residence to do some work in the bathroom. Chatting with the personable fellow, he pointed out that when he works an emergency service on Christmas Day, he can take home $1,000. For just one – admittedly very long – day.

So what's this business about university as the default position for Jewish families and their precious progeny?

Putting a youngster through university can cost tens of thousands of dollars. Will that cost, along with the foregone earning years spent racking up that debt, ever be recouped? Is there not a financial case to be made for a different post-secondary education, something related to the trades?

The conundrum can be illustrated with a joke that has made the rounds, a variation of which goes like this: "What do you say to a sociology major?" Answer: "Make mine a double skinny, vanilla bean latte."

For all too many university grads, the B in BA (bachelor of arts) will come to stand for barista. That's another joke about a third joke – the career value of some degrees.

Preparing children to succeed is the responsibility of parents everywhere, and so a question that increasingly is being asked is this: is a university education – a multi-year investment of tens of thousands of dollars – worth the price, especially when a shorter, less costly education can lead to employment in a number of fields, that pay well but may not be as glamorous or prestigious as a white collar job.

"There is a huge increase in the number of jobs in the trades," said Deborah Childs, director of youth programming services for JVS Toronto (Jewish Vocational Services). "Statistics show that there's going to be a huge need for skilled trades people."

An experienced, professional welder can expect to earn upward of $150,000 a year, says Canada's Citizenship and Immigration Minister Chris Alexander.

Nevertheless, she continued, "there's definitely resistance from parents" about directing their children to skilled trades. "People are so resistant. There's a stereotype that going to university will get you a better job. That's not the case any more."

A bachelor's degree "is like having a Grade 12 education at this point." It might only be good enough to get you a job at Starbucks, she added.

At the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel campus, few kids go on to a trade. "If it's right for the student, that's definitely something they should consider," said Richard Stoll, head of guidance at the school. "Here, very few kids go on to colleges or trades. That's just not the dynamic here [nor] the philosophy of the parents."

Margaret Klompas, head of guidance at TanenbaumCHAT's Wallenberg campus, said "we don't offer courses that teach the trades because most of the students here are bound for college or university.

"However, if they do show an interest, we try to encourage them and give them any help we can."

'Job market is very good in skilled trades,' Skills Canada CEO says

Shayla Morrison, vice-principal at Robbins Hebrew Academy (RHA), said students at the school are encouraged to "follow their passions, (do) what they want to do."

"It might be in property management, in tech, running a hotel," she said. "You want to encourage them to do what they want."

At RHA, she continued, "we're giving them the basics, nurturing them and getting them ready for the 21st century."

The school stresses critical thinking and working in collaboration. Ultimately, "they have to find their niche and be happy. You want to make money, but do something that's a passion," she said.

According to Childs, reality is biting young people when they enter the marketplace searching for jobs. An interesting trend is that students are enrolling in community colleges after completing three or four years in university. That number is now at 30 per cent, said Stoll.

There is work in the building trades, Childs said, and JVS helps its clients gain work experience through an apprenticeship program with a local union, followed by placement with an employer.

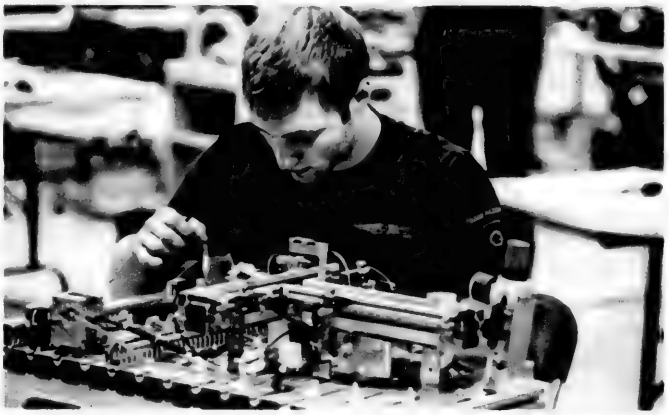
"The job market is very good in the skilled trades area," said Shaun Thorson, CEO of Skills Canada, a not-for-profit organization that promotes careers in skilled trades. "There are a lot of opportunities in Western Canada in the energy industry. A lot of people in the skilled trades are reaching retirement age and we need replacements."

Citing data from Statistics Canada, Thorson said,"On average, skilled trades people who are certified make 10 per cent more than the average salary."

"My best advice for students is to consider all your options." There's nothing wrong with a university education but programs at community colleges coupled with apprenticeships "can be appealing."

"Earn while you can," he added.

Careers in the electrical, plumbing, and welding fields, even cooks and bakers all have apprenticeship programs that combine work experience with classroom learning. As much as 80 to 85 per cent of the training is on the job. That way, they get paid for 10 months, and follow it up with two months in a classroom, Thorson said.



Shaun Thorson, CEO of Skills Canada, says careers in electrical, plumbing and welding have apprenticeship programs that combine classroom learning with work experience.

With the changing job market "there has been significant growth in the skilled trades over the last 15 years, with the number of people enrolling in technical schools increasing significantly, he said.

In Western Canada, there's demand for steamfitters and power system engineers. In the GTA, auto services are in demand as are aircraft maintenance mechanics.

These are the kinds of occupations that require good maths skills and knowledge of science, he continued.

It appears public attitudes are playing catchup to the new economic realities. A 2004 study that asked students how they viewed jobs in the skilled trades reported that 29 per cent felt it was something they would consider. In 2012, 40 per cent "now would consider a career in the skilled trades," Thorson said.

"A lot of young people have a very limited view of the workforce opportunity, so they have to expand that," he added.

Welding school, anyone?

Be yourself. Be great.

New Jewish education exec aims to bring more students into the day school system

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

Daniel Held began as executive director of the Julia and Henry Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Education, UJA Federation in January. Serving more than 70 day and supplementary schools in Toronto, the centre and its leaders are often the focus of the community's concerns over the quality of Jewish education and especially tuition costs.

Held, who is just 31, comes to the board with a background in teaching, research, writing and consulting work. He's a product of the city's Jewish day school system as a graduate of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. He's a PhD candidate in Jewish education at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York.

The CJN interviewed Held recently at his office.

What is current enrolment in Toronto's Jewish education system?

There are about 16,000 [students] in the formal education system. This includes both day and supplementary schools. Of course, there are others who received Jewish education from non-formal settings – camps, youth movements, synagogues, [Canada] Israel Experience, March of the Living, etc. Of the 16,000, about 11,000 are in Jewish day schools and 5,000 in supplementary schools. We estimate there to be about 35,000 Jewish school-aged kids in the GTA. This means that about 46 per cent of kids are currently engaged in formal Jewish education. That's a phenomenal penetration rate.

The [actual] number of kids who have received a formal Jewish education is higher, as there is attrition at various points. So a 16-year-old who went to day school from kindergarten to grade eight, but is [now] in a public high school, would be counted in the 35,000, but not the 16,000.

How viable is the system financially? Is there a point at which financial viability is imperiled because of enrolment?

There are two challenges we need to be thinking about: One is financial sustainability and the other is affordability. They are inter-related but to some degree separate. Our day schools right now in Toronto are doing very well in terms of both. That doesn't mean there aren't challenges and doesn't mean families don't feel the pinch. I'm not overly concerned about sustainability. I think schools are looking very hard at their numbers and are doing a good job about being accountable to themselves, the parents and their boards. They are looking at both the cost and revenue sides, as they should be.

Daniel Held

One of the things we should be doing: We have huge amounts of money in tuition subventions, like scholarships. One piece of the total work we do in terms of financial sustainability and affordability [is] we are empowering schools to think creatively. So we're working with Robbins Hebrew Academy to create the iCAP Program, which will cap tuition at 15 per cent of [parents' gross] household income. It's a matter of helping schools think creatively and be innovative. And it offers stability in terms of parents' planning. [The RHA iCAP program will begin in September 2014].

If it works, will iCAP be extended to other schools?

The idea is to learn from the experiment. It certainly could be. I'm not convinced it's a panacea but it's a step in the right direction. And I think we need to look at multiple different experiments and possibilities.

What percentage of children in the system are subsidized and how does that affect financial viability?

About 2,300 students receive subsidies through the UJA Federation system. This is about 25 per cent of students in funded schools. This number has been relatively stable for the last 10 years. Federation invests about $10 million annually in day school subsidies. This is a staggeringly large amount compared to other communities. We also know that the subsidies impact not only the families who receive [them], but they help moderate the fees for the whole system. The difference between what [subsidized parents] are paying and the school fees is split between federation and the school. So both are putting in money for those kids.

Two Jewish mothers opt for supplementary Hebrew school rather than private school

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

It wasn't a decision they took lightly, but in the end, two Thornhill mothers have decided to opt for public school rather than Jewish day school for their children.

Brenda Honigman, a stay-at-home mother whose two sons are 7 and 9, said that when her boys were in junior and senior kindergarten, the oldest was at Associated Hebrew Schools, and the youngest was at public school.

"I kept comparing, kept changing my mind back and forth. They were both happy, they were both learning, and they each had Jewish friends," Honigman said.

"It just didn't make sense financially, though, for us to spend so much money for them to learn Hebrew every day. I wanted them to concentrate on English."

She said she and her husband, Arnie Deltoff, enrolled their sons in a part-time program at Beit Rayim Hebrew School at the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan.

"They go twice a week, and they're learning Hebrew prayers, all about the holidays and Shabbat, and they recently had a siddur ceremony. We realize that they're not getting as much as they would in day school, but they're learning, and they're getting Jewish content. We're happy with our decision," she said.

Honigman said that when she grew up in Winnipeg, she attended the I. L. Peretz Folk School, a Jewish private school that will be celebrating its 100th anniversary in May.

"I loved it, and it was a challenge to think of public school for my sons, but it's different times, and I'm content."

She added that most of the Beit Rayim teachers also work at some of the Jewish day schools in the Toronto area, "so we're getting the same teachers."

Shayla Gunter-Goldstein, a freelance writer and editor whose two sons are 4 and 8, also has them enrolled in public school. The youngest is in junior kindergarten at her local school, and the oldest is in Grade 3 in French immersion, which she feels is "almost like a private school. Learning French is a tremendous advantage in this country."

She said that she and her husband, Jack, wanted the boys to learn conversational Hebrew, "but that isn't really taught in the day schools."

They started their son at Kachol Lavan Centre: the School for Hebrew and Israel Studies, a supplementary school that offers conversational Hebrew. "It caters to Israelis, though, and a lot of programs were in Hebrew. It didn't really work for him."

She also has the two boys at Beit Rayim now, "and they're not getting as much [conversational Hebrew] as we would like, but they are learning. We realize that we will have to give them special lessons to learn Hebrew."

She said that although the financial aspect is a huge one in choosing between Jewish day school and public school, "for us, it wasn't everything.

"We both went to public school. I grew up in Hamilton, and always had non-Jewish friends. I went to a Hebrew [supplementary] school and Jewish camps, but was friends with the neighbourhood kids."

These days, she said, most people don't know their neighbours because everyone goes to different schools.

"We want to be part of the neighbourhood. It's important to us for our kids to lead a multicultural life. We want them to be friends with everyone, and know that everyone is the same. That's how we feel about the people in our lives. [Being] multicultural is part of who we are."

She added that her boys have many Jewish friends, and they keep a kosher home, "but we're happy when they get to decorate a friend's Christmas tree."

Most importantly, the two mothers agree, their sons are growing up with Yiddishkeit in the house.

"We go to synagogue, we have Shabbat dinner, and I sing a lot of Yiddish songs around the house," said Gunter-Goldstein.

"If you have a Jewish spirit, and a Jewish house, your children grow up knowing they're Jewish."

Her family is planning a trip to Israel, and her oldest son is getting very excited, she said.

"He learned about a lot of Israeli sites at [Beit Rayim] Hebrew school and he wants to see them. He is beginning to get a strong Israeli identity."

iPads are replacing Smart Boards in some day schools

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Jewish day schools are going through an evolutionary process with the integration of technology into the classrooms.

The trend has been growing for years, with some schools adopting new devices earlier than others, and teachers are recognizing that the technology is completely changing how teachers teach.

This year, in Montreal, Bialik High School bought iPads for all students in grades 7 to 9, in addition to equipping every classroom with a Smart Board or projectors, as well as Apple TV.

"It's much more dynamic," said Lee Zentner, a teacher at Bialik who spearheaded the integration of iPads into the curriculum for the high school, explaining that kids often create presentations on their iPads and use Apple TV to project it in front of the classroom. "The old 'chalk and talk' is old school now."

Ted Liss, computer, designs and science teacher at Toronto's Leo Baeck Day School's south campus, said the teachers use Apple TV on a regular basis, projecting whatever is on their computers to the front of the classroom. In that sense, it replaces the Smart Board, which itself was a touch-sensitive interactive replacement for the blackboard.

Zentner said moving from Smart Boards to iPads means he's able to teach the class from anywhere in the room.

"Teachers in general... we're used to being at the front. 'I'm at the front, all eyes on me.' But truthfully, overall, we're moving away from that," he said. "Kids are learning way quicker than we ever imagined. To have the whole Internet to themselves, they could research everything we're talking about."

The Toronto Heschel School's curriculum consultant and incoming head of school, Greg Beiles, said he's a little bit wary about bringing technology into the classroom too quickly.

Need to focus on middle income families, Held says

Recently, you wrote in The CJN about five challenges facing the Jewish system: Controlling costs, determining and reaching capacity, communal collaboration, middle income initiatives and endowment building. Can you elaborate?

In North America, between 70 and 80 per cent of the average day school budget goes to human resources – teachers and administrators. One of the things I need to be doing over the next few months is learning the Toronto numbers better. The initiatives that we've seen across North America have focused on that 70 to 80 per cent. There have been a few things, like collective purchasing, which will draw down the costs of goods and services a school buys. So we're seeing things like blended learning schools that use technology and allow schools to have higher student-teacher ratios.

[According to one North American study], day schools are operating at 70 percent of capacity, which really means that there's a 30 per cent inefficiency in the average classroom. One of the things I need to delve into more is where we are in Toronto, which will be very different between schools. For every student added to a class, even at a discounted tuition rate, they're bringing in more revenue because the major cost of the class is fixed: It's the teacher. So other costs are marginal when you think about the revenue you bring in, even at a discounted rate.

Capacity is also difficult to determine. We talk about physical capacity, operational capacity, the number of students in a class. So it's difficult to say what capacity is. But if we can move our schools toward capacity, then it means we are going to budget for the educational value because we believe day schools are really good for our kids.

Communal collaboration takes place on both the revenue and cost side. On the cost side we see things like collective purchasing, schools that have shared spaces and resources. On the revenue side we've seen communal funds and endowments.

One of the focuses that we need to place emphasis on is middle income families. That's really the goal of the RHA pilot. We've seen two modes of middle income initiatives in North America. One is flat grants and the other is based on the flexible tuition model. It has to be a real focus of our attention. Middle income families feel the challenges.

None of these are a panacea and none is a solution to sustainability and financial affordability. But they're all steps toward them. The challenge with endowments is that the sums are just massive. Let's say you have 11,000 students in day schools. Let's say you want to reduce day school tuition by $5,000 a year. That's $55 million a year. The numbers are staggering.

All five of these conversations need to be happening in parallel. No one has a silver bullet. We need to think creatively and learn from best practices.

You also wrote that "significantly moving the needle in the costs and funding of day schools will require substantive changes both in the ways we deliver education and in the ways we fund the costs of this education." What are some of those changes?

If we are going to drastically reduce costs, that's going to come down to drastically changing the way we deliver education. We've seen blended learning schools in the States which reduce tuition to somewhere around $5,000 a student. They changed the model of education. They changed the student-teacher ratio and the way they deliver education. The changes in the delivery of education have brought changes to the financial situation.

I actually think that the 15 percent model is a significant change in how we think about day school tuition – and a big move away from saying "this is the price," to thinking about parents' ability to pay.

Every conversation I have with day school lay leaders and heads of school touches on these questions. We're all thinking about them and addressing them.

So much of my role is convening conversations and making myself accessible. One of things I am going to do is to make sure that every week, I have time set aside to have these conversations. It's on my calendar, from 2 p.m. to 4 p.m., every Tuesday.

Regarding tuition, there are a lot angry, weary parents out there. What can you say to them to make them breath a little easier?

I hear these questions all the time, and I empathize with the costs of day school education and the burden it puts on parents and families. It's a great concern that I and the system need to be thinking about. I don't have the silver bullet. I think federation is investing more than any other federation – more than $10 million a year in just tuition subvention. I see us convening the conversations about tuition and thinking creatively about financial sustainability and affordability. I bring a texture and knowledge to it: My experience as a teacher and as a parent. My daughter is in JCC daycare and will soon be starting in the day school system. No one has the silver bullet. But I think this can bring a richness [to] the conversation and a knowledge base to Toronto.

GIVING OF THE TABLETS:

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, centre right, and Likud MK and Deputy Knesset Speaker Ofir Akunis, centre left, presented tablet computers to 94 children in Lod earlier this month as part of a government initiative to provide educational opportunities for underprivileged children. At the ceremony, Netanyahu said the initiative is part of the government's plan to minimize educational, geographical and socioeconomic gaps in Israeli society.

'Technology is not a pedagogy,' Heschel head says

"Technology is not pedagogy," he said. "A computer is kind of like pencil, a tool… [It's] not an educational philosophy, and it can also get in the way of learning."

He said you couldn't say a school is great because they have computers in every classroom, because that's just like pointing out that there are chairs in every classroom.

While kids have the sum of all human knowledge at their fingertips when connected to the Internet, it can pose problems. Beiles pointed out that much of the content available online isn't vetted the same way it would be if it were going into a textbook, and most of what you encounter online is "garbage."

Liss said it's up to the school to start teaching the kids how to research.

"I think we're passing on our knowledge less and less all the time, but we still have to help guide them," he said. For example, he ran a class in which the kids researched famous people. The kids would search the person on Google, and come up with millions of results.

He sees a major problem in the Internet's inability to tell whether the researcher is an eight-year-old kid or a 28-year-old adult.

"They can't just go hog-wild and Google everything because they get frustrated easily," he said. "There's all the information in the entire world presented to you, and you have to sort through it all."

That's a skill the kids have to learn even if they are digital natives, said Jennifer Nyman, a teacher at Bialik's elementary division, Jewish People's and Peretz Schools.

"They come in and say they know how to use an iPad but really, they don't," she said. "They have to learn which apps are useful and how to actually use them."

But for kids with organizational issues, the technology could be a blessing. Liss said he's particularly noticed a change in how some students keep their notes.

"[With computers,] they don't lose their papers," he said.

The benefits don't stop there, Zentner said. Having the technology increases his ability to teach every kind of learner, whether they're visual, aural or kinesthetic learners. For example, he recently downloaded a biology app to show how the human body processes blood.

"A few kids started saying, 'Now I know what you mean,'" he said. "Before, if I was trying to draw [the process], I might get a few visionary learners, but now I'm [reaching] more [students]."

They also can move at their own pace, said Beiles, though he added that technology is useful only when it teaches them something they could not otherwise learn without the devices.

"Most teachers don't know how to use Smart Boards and just use it as a glorified blackboard. In that case blackboards are better," he said.

He also emphasized the importance of students doing things with their hands. "I think we lose a lot of learning when all kids are doing with their hands is clicking."

But perhaps the technology leads the changes to the curriculum even if you don't notice it happening, Zentner said.

"They're learning a lot more of everything and a little less detail so they can cover more areas," he said.

That said, Beiles said he doesn't think kids without so much technology in the classroom will fall behind, since devices change rapidly as new technology is developed.

"Just because they're using an iPad today doesn't mean that'll help them," he said. That said, "computers are the big tool of the day – we wouldn't deprive our kids of that – but a school needs to be able to ground itself in deep educational philosophy."

Jennifer Nyman, a teacher at Montreal's Bialik High School, says students need to learn which apps are useful and how to use them.

School offers options for learning disabled

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Ensuring that your child receives the best education possible is one of the greatest challenges a parent can face, especially if your child is coping with a learning disability.

Merle L. Levine Academy (MLA) offers a leg-up to students who need to harness their learning disabilities such as Attention Deficit Disorder, Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder and other similar conditions affecting academic achievement.

Merle Langbord Levine, who founded the North York-area school in 1995, has been working as an educator since 1959, and specializing in the field of special education since 1969.

MLA is an exclusive private school that educates students from grades 2 to 12 who don't respond well to mainstream education techniques.

"Many elementary and secondary school-aged children struggle to realize their full potential within the mainstream or special education classroom because they have differences or difficulties in how they learn or pay attention," Levine said.

Earlier in her teaching career, Levine worked with struggling students at Associated Hebrew Schools and United Synagogue Day School, (which is now Robbins Hebrew Academy).

"These were bright kids, but they were disorganized. They couldn't put things together," she recalled.

Recently, Levine has been working with students with complex learning difficulties including Autism Spectrum Disorder (ASD), Asperger Syndrome, non-verbal learning disabilities, auditory processing difficulties and mood disorders. These children are struggling in school both academically and socially.

According to Statistics Canada, more than three per cent of Canadian children have a learning disability – a term that refers to a variety of disorders that may affect a person's ability to listen, speak, read, write, understand and retain information.

According to the Learning Disabilities Association of Canada, students with learning disabilities may be of above-average intelligence but still struggle to keep up with their peers in class.

A 2012 study by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta, said that the awareness of ASD has come into the public eye over the past 20 years, attracting attention due to its rapid growth rate in North America. In the United States, about one in 88 children are diagnosed with ASD. From 2007 to 2012, the number of children diagnosed with ASD jumped by 78 per cent.

The National Epidemiologic Database for the Study of Autism in Canada, also released a study in 2012, and it found increases in autism diagnoses in Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland and Labrador and southeastern Ontario that ranged from 39 to 204 per cent.

At MLA, the idea is to help students coping with these disadvantages to improve their core academic skills, think critically, question, evaluate information, draw conclusions and reintegrate into the mainstream school system.

"Our students are typically behind their grade academically in some or most of their subjects. They may also be ahead of their grades in some other subject areas. They generally have an uneven learning profile. But many of our students (95 per cent) go on to succeed in post-secondary education," Levine said.

The students who enroll at MLA utilize the program to catch up academically.

"The idea is to come in for two or three years and get caught up. The bulk of our kids are between grades 4 or 5 and high school," said Levine, adding that the program is not geared towards students with severe emotional or behavioural problems.

She said that social skills training has been a growing trend in educational settings, and that the development of social literacy is essential to growth and development, which leads to students' learning and achievement.

With a multi-disciplinary approach to learning, MLA's 40 students work one-on-one, or in a small group setting.

"We are a remedial school. The school is precisely for kids who are out of sync with the system or behind it."

Levine said one of the most rewarding aspects of her 45-year career working with students in special education is that most do end up at post-secondary school.

"The majority of our kids go on to university. As well, there are my original students – now well into their 40s – who still keep in touch. A few are even sending their children to me, as some experience similar difficulties. To witness the change in these kids is just unbelievable."

Ari Shavit's Promised Land

Author tackles Israel's existential dilemmas in controversial book

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Ari Shavit is a columnist for the Israeli daily Ha'aretz, and author of My Promised Land: The Triumph and Tragedy of Israel.

In the book, which spent several weeks on the New York Times' bestseller list, he traces the history of Israel through the eyes of its people, and addresses the existential issues it faces.

In an interview with The CJN, Shavit outlines the premise of his book: to rewrite Israel's narrative, to look at the larger picture of its existence and to see it, with all its flaws, as one of the great successes of the 20th century.

A former Peace Now activist, Shavit came to realize over a 20-year span that "there are some serious flaws in the banal, dogmatic peace concept." Instead, he developed a more complex approach in which Israel's occupation of disputed territories would have to be addressed, whether peace resulted or not.

He outlines his own "Plan B," an alternative plan if diplomatic efforts fail. He also touches on the origins of the conflict and on domestic Israeli issues such as the significance of the mass marches during the summer of 2011, in which thousands of Israelis took to the streets to demand a new deal from the government.

Famed Sculptor Dies

TORONTO — World-renowned Canadian sculptor Sorel Etrog, whose works include a major installation at the Canada Pavilion at Expo 67 and many public sculptures in Toronto, died Feb. 26 in Toronto at age 80. The Romanian-born Etrog survived World War II and moved to Israel with his family in 1950. He studied art at Tel Aviv's Institute of Painting and Sculpture, which led to his first show in 1958. That won him a scholarship to the Brooklyn Museum, and in 1958, the Guggenheim Museum bought one of his sculptures. In New York, he met Toronto collector Samuel Zacks, who became his champion. Etrog, who was also an accomplished poet and writer, became a Canadian citizen in 1963.

Minister Apologizes

TORONTO — Ontario Tourism, Culture and Sport Minister Michael Chan apologized for saying Prime Minister Stephen Harper has favoured the Jewish community over other groups and may have been motivated by votes and a desire to improve fundraising. In a Feb. 27 statement, Chan said he personally apologized to Jewish leaders and extended his "sincere apology to the entire community." Chan made the remarks to a Chinese-language newspaper ahead of a Feb. 13 provincial byelection in Thornhill. He was urging voters to support fellow Liberal Sandra Yeung Racco over Tory Gila Martow, the eventual winner. The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs said it accepted Chan's apology, Sun Media reported.

Canadian Buys Condo

TEL AVIV — An unnamed Jewish-Canadian real estate developer has bought a seaside penthouse condominium in Tel Aviv's 10 Herbert Samuel development for $35 million (110 million shekels). The 7,500-square-foot unit, which is still under construction, is on the 20th and 21st floors and has 3,300 square feet of balcony space. The building has 40 units, 36 of which have been sold. A 4,300-square-foot unit on the 19th floor sold in July 2013 for $15 million.

Report Questions Rabbi's Refugee Claim

TORONTO — The refugee application of Lev Tahor founder Rabbi Shlomo Helbrans may have been based on false testimony, a CBC Fifth Estate investigation suggests.

Rabbi Shlomo Helbrans

The report, which aired Feb. 28, said Rabbi Helbrans' 1996 claim was based in part on testimony from Uriel Goldman, now a spokesperson for the controversial ultra-Orthodox sect.

Goldman said that as a young intelligence officer, he was told by the Israel Defence Forces to spy on the rabbi when he was still in Israel and ended up joining the sect, but the IDF told the Fifth Estate it had no record of Goldman serving in IDF intelligence.

Also included in the rabbi's refugee claim was a video of Shai Fima, a 13-year-old boy whom the rabbi was convicted of kidnapping in the United States in 1994. Rabbi Helbrans served two years for the crime and was deported to Israel upon his release in 1996. He claimed refugee status in Canada that same year, saying he faced persecution in Israel due to his anti-Zionist beliefs.

In a video submitted to Rabbi Helbrans' 2003 refugee hearing, Fima said the conviction was a misunderstanding and sought to clear the rabbi's name. Fima now says that video was a lie and that he was paid $5,000 for it. Rabbi Helbrans told CBC that Fima was lying. He has previously claimed that Fima was brought to him for bar mitzvah training and ran away on his own from his parents.

Goldman told the Fifth Estate the sect paid for Fima's travels, but nothing else. He also said it's no surprise the IDF wouldn't comment on sensitive military operations.

Day schools urge parents to 'choose Jewish'

Event geared to those deciding where to enrol their kids

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

More than 100 people gathered last week to hear from a panel of Jewish educators, parents, current students and alumni about the benefits of a Jewish day school education for their children.

The "Why Choose Jewish" forum, held Feb. 25 at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, came on the heels of a successful marketing campaign that saw nine Toronto Jewish day schools – Associated Hebrew Schools, TanenbaumCHAT, the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, Bialik Hebrew Day School, Zareinu Education Centre, Leo Baeck Day School, the Toronto Heschel School, Robbins Hebrew Academy and the Montessori Jewish Day School – partner to promote the message that a Jewish education, at any Jewish day school, is the best choice.

The event, which targeted parents who are in the process of deciding where to send their kids to school, was moderated by Josh Elkin, former executive director of the U.S.-based Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education.

Among the five panelists was Nicholas Stein, a father of two children who attend the Montessori Jewish Day School.

Stein, who sits on Montessori's board and is involved in the Choose Jewish initiative, said it was time Jewish day schools in the city came together for a common purpose.

"It's unprecedented, and sends a positive message that at the end of the day, we have a very vibrant Jewish community in the city," Stein told The CJN.

The purpose of the event was to give parents who may be considering Jewish day schools a glimpse into what they offer.

Daniel Held

"The idea behind this panel was to get a broad range of points of views from current students, from graduates from parents and alumni, to really give people a sense of the different reasons for making this choice," he said.

When it came to down to making the decision for his children, "it wasn't always a given," Stein said.

"I didn't attend day school myself. I attended public school in Toronto. But I felt like it was really important to me that my children see their Jewish education, both the religious part and the Hebrew part, as being just as important as math and science and English. I felt that putting them in an environment where they would learn all of these subjects side by side, it would just send a really strong message to them that these were things that should be valued. I think that was a big consideration for me."

Stein wishes he could have had a Jewish day school education.

U.S. should press Syria on chemical weapons disposal

CTV News reported last week that, according to UN High Commissioner for Refugees Antonio Guterres, "if current trends continue" Syrians will soon overtake Afghans as the world's biggest refugee population, exceeding four million by year's end.

The number of refugees increases as the slaughter inside Syria continues unabated: during last month's Geneva II talks aimed at stopping the fighting, which failed miserably, nearly 1,900 Syrians were killed.

According to Reports

BY PAUL MICHAELS

The Washington Post was scathing about America's investment in the talks, mainly for being outplayed by the Russians, who are backing Assad.

As in the Feb. 22 Post editorial: "The Assad regime made no pretense of taking seriously the nominal purpose of the Geneva talks, which was to agree on a ceasefire, the opening of corridors for humanitarian aid and a transitional government acceptable to both the government and the opposition. Nor did Russia pressure its ally to go along with that agenda."

On Feb. 17, U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry lashed out at Russia for the talks' failure: "The [Assad] regime stonewalled, they did nothing except continue to drop barrel bombs on their own people and continue to destroy their own country. And I regret to say they're doing so with increased support from Iran, from Hezbollah and from Russia."

In the meantime, supported by Russia, Iran continues aggressively arming Assad's regime. Reuters reported Feb. 21: "As Syria's war nears the start of its fourth year, Iran has stepped up support on the ground for President Bashar Assad, providing elite teams to gather intelligence and train troops." Iran also backs thousands of Hezbollah fighters who've been in the vanguard of Assad's onslaught.

In the Feb. 26 New York Times, Michael Ignatieff argued that it's time for the United States to use force "to deny Mr. Assad air superiority…[to] prevent his forces from using barrel bombs, cluster munitions and phosphorus weapons on civilian targets," and "to leverage diplomacy in Syria" as the United States had done in Bosnia.

Although not oblivious to the Americans' deep reluctance to be embroiled in yet another Mideast conflict and risk a confrontation with the Russians, in Ignatieff's view, doing nothing is worse: "American inaction has strengthened Russia, Hezbollah and Iran. It has turned Syria into the next front in the war with Islamic extremism. And it has put in jeopardy the stability of Jordan, Lebanon, Iraq and Turkey and risks leaving a failed state next door to Israel."

Ignatieff also acknowledges that unilateral American military action outside a United Nations mandate (given the inevitable Russian Security Council veto) would render its operation illegal, albeit, in his estimation, still necessary.

In a Feb. 21 paper for the Washington Institute, Syrian expert Andrew Tabler proposed a possible way around the illegality issue. Syria is currently in violation of its commitments to destroy or dispose of its chemical weapons under the terms of UN Security Council Resolution 2118 (Sept. 27, 2013). According to Tabler, "The [Assad] regime is dragging its feet on disposing of its chemical weapons, with only 11 per cent of only the first shipment transferred out of the country so far. And on Jan. 30, U.S. authorities reported that the regime has 'revised' its initial declarations… refusing to destroy its 12 declared weapons sites."

Significantly, Security Council resolution 2118 contains a Chapter VII enforcement clause mandating sanctions and the use of force in cases of non-compliance. "Pushing now on 2118 would create a useful dilemma, forcing Moscow to reveal whether it is unable or simply unwilling to goad the Assad regime into eliminating its [chemical weapons] program and negotiating a political transition. This approach would also prepare the American public for a possible military showdown with Assad this summer over his refusal to dispose of chemical agents," Tabler argued.

Even if no such mandated force is deployed against Assad, many critics of what they claim is American passivity would be encouraged to see the United States vigorously pressure the Russians (and Assad) under the terms of this Security Council resolution. That might be as good a place to start as any.

Paul Michaels is director of research and senior media relations for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

The bottom line on IAW

Israeli Apartheid Week is marking its 10-year anniversary this week across Canada, and as IAW organizers and supporters look back on their movement's first decade, there's no doubt it has fundamentally shifted the Israel conversation on campuses across this country and the world. (This year, IAW events are being held in 87 cities worldwide, and the "week" will last from Feb. 24 to March 28.) Tagging along, the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) crusade has grown stronger than it ever was before Israeli Apartheid Week came on the scene. All told, in just 10 years, IAW has become a powerful force, in academia and beyond.

Israeli Apartheid Week 2014 actually kicked off a few days ahead of schedule in these parts, in Windsor, Ont. Vandals broke into the office of Jake De Jong, the vice-president of academic affairs for the University of Windsor Student Alliance, overnight last Wednesday. When he arrived at work Thursday morning, De Jong found the "Support Our Troops" flag hanging in his office had been spray-painted with a Star of David and the word "Zionist." Two days later, University of Windsor undergraduates approved a BDS strategy in a referendum – a first for Canada. De Jong, by the way, had been critical of the referendum question ahead of the vote.

A day before the break-in, 3,700 kilometres away in sunny California, the University of California, Los Angeles' student council debated whether to adopt a BDS-style resolution at a marathon nine-hour session during U.S. Israeli Apartheid Week. In the end, the council rejected divestment from Caterpillar, General Electric, Hewlett-Packard, Cemex and Cement Roadstone Holdings (companies that BDS proponents argue are employed by the IDF in its effort to flout Palestinian human rights) in a 7-5 vote. And one blubbering student became online fodder after her highly emotional reaction to the result was caught on camera (though in her defence, if I had just sat through a nine-hour Israel-vs.-Palestinian blow-up, I'd probably have been sobbing uncontrollably, too).

Two campuses, two very different outcomes for IAW/BDS. Makes you wonder what the next 10 years will hold for Israeli Apartheid Week: Will there be more "victories" and violence as in Windsor, or more setbacks and silliness like at UCLA?

Time will tell, but as IAW turns 10, one thing is becoming abundantly clear: pro-Israel students are getting better at fighting back. The #rethink2014 initiative, a social media strategy dreamed up by third-year King's College London student Hannah Brady, 20, is a major breakthrough for opponents of IAW/BDS that has put Israeli Apartheid Week on the defensive. The clever campaign – which asks people to tweet an ending to the phrase "I oppose Israeli Apartheid Week because…" – is scoring points against IAW in a region where it has traditionally held sway: online.

For the record, here's my contribution to #rethink2014: "I oppose Israeli Apartheid Week because if it's not, at the core, really just about Jew-hatred, then it's pretty damn close – and, either way, it's an exercise in intellectual dishonesty."

It doesn't matter where you go to school, or what country or continent you live in/on – when it comes to Israeli Apartheid Week, that's the bottom line.

Adler responds to media coverage

I was disappointed to see the media coverage last week about the private welcome reception I co-hosted for some members of the Canadian delegation in Israel during Prime Minister Stephen Harper's recent visit. The national media story based on an unnamed source regrettably attempts to pit one supporter of Israel against another supporter. I co-hosted this event, outside of the official program for the historic visit to Israel, and there was no taxpayer money involved.

Our government's recent trip to Israel was incredibly emotional. During my speech at this welcome reception, I even broke down as I spoke about my father, the only survivor from his family after the Holocaust, who always wanted to visit Israel but never made it before he passed.

This was a very exciting, but very difficult trip for me. I was pleased to be accompanied by so many prominent members of the Jewish community, including a number of rabbis from York Centre, who were a comfort and support during this trip.

Thank you for promoting empathy

Children start off life as caring, loving, empathetic beings, and they only lose those traits because the adults in their community see to it. Children are told to "grow a thick skin" and are chastised by adults when they display a loving and caring attitude to our non-human brethren. While we might not tell them outright that their empathy is wrong, we certainly let them know that their lives would be better without that amount of caring for others. And that is wrong on every single level imaginable.

Therefore, I find it very sad that people accuse your writer of convincing her son to be a loving, caring, compassionate individual ("My son, the activist," The CJN, Feb. 27). Many thanks to the writer for promoting empathy in her son. Children like him are going to have to change the world, if we're going to survive.

Home-schooling is not enough

Raquel Kaplan Goldberg is correct in suggesting that Jewish home-schooling is not enough ("Raising our kids to be knowledgeable Jews," The CJN, Feb. 20). The CJN's editor, Yoni Goldstein, can certainly teach his children the Jewish values of respect for human dignity, justice, and tikkun olam, but that will not distinguish them from their Christian schoolmates. It will only mean that they will easily fit in with the better part of the Christian community.

As Goldberg suggests, home-schooling will not enable children to have a broad foundation, instruction book or reference guide for not only Jewish problems and a Jewish lifestyle, but for secular problems as well. It will not enable them to immerse themselves in the Jewish community and have that as their community and source of morality.

Canadian Christians live by very similar moral codes as Canadian Jews. To maintain Jewish values, we must give our children all the wonderful tools and morals of Judaism. For that, a good knowledge of Torah and ritual is required.

The forgotten talmudic story about the birth of Christianity

Shraga Bar-On

At the beginning of the 20th century, in an almost prophetic act, Samuel Hirszenberg painted The Wandering Jew as a bearded old man running horrified past corpses lying in a forest of crosses. Did the artist, one of the founders of Bezalel Art College in Jerusalem, think that it was an unavoidable curse and that the Jews were destined to flee in such terror?

Israel's founding prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, liked to pose for photos with visitors near that picture, which now hangs in the Israel Museum. He surely assumed that the wandering Jew finally had found shelter from the horrifying Crusades against the Jewish people. Indeed, the Jews have found more than shelters; rather they have found homelands in Israel and in North America, changing the relationships between Jews and Christians.

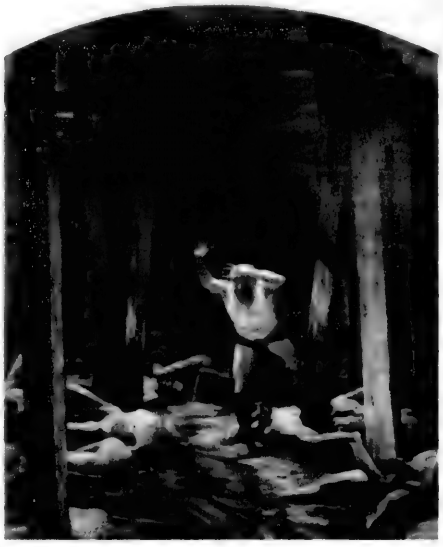
From the founding of Christianity through the middle of the 20th century, except for brief periods of tolerance, animosity reigned between the two religions. Because Christianity was based on the negation of Judaism, the conflict had been viewed for 2,000 years as a zero-sum game.

In this regard, it is interesting to note the following unique talmudic story, once censored from traditional versions of the Talmud, which proposes a different story about the birth of Christianity:

Our rabbis have taught: "Always let the left hand thrust away and the right hand draw near… Not like Rabbi Joshua ben Perahiah who thrust Jesus away with both his hands…

"What was the incident with Rabbi Joshua ben Perahiah? When King Jannaeus put the rabbis to death, Simeon ben Shetah was hidden by his sister, while Rabbi Joshua ben Perahiah fled to Alexandria in Egypt.

"When there was peace, Simeon ben Shetah sent [this message to him]: 'From me, Jerusalem, the Holy city, to thee Alexandria in Egypt. O my sister, my husband dwelleth in thy midst and I abide desolate'. [Rabbi Joshua] arose and came back and found himself in a certain inn where they paid him great respect. He said: 'How beautiful is this 'aksania'! Jesus said to him, 'My master, her eyes are narrow!' He replied to him, 'Wicked person! Is it with such thoughts that thou occupiest thyself!' He sent forth 400 horns and excommunicated him. [Jesus] came before him on many occasions, saying 'Receive me', but he refused to notice him. One day while [Rabbi Joshua] was reciting the Shema, Jesus came before him. His intention was to receive him and he made a sign to him with his hand, but Jesus thought he was repelling him. So he went and set up a brick and worshipped it. [Rabbi Joshua] said to him, 'Repent'; but he answered him, 'Thus have I received from thee that whoever sinned and caused others to sin is deprived of the power of doing penitence.'"



The Wandering Jew by Samuel Hirszenberg

This is a late adaptation of a non-historical story that originally was not about Jesus at all. According to the story, Jesus was a faithful disciple of Joshua ben Perahiah (who had actually lived 100 years earlier). Dating the birth of Christianity to the period of the Hasmonean King Jannaeus shows that the sages were not interested in historic details, but rather in the values they wished to convey.

The cause of the rift between Judaism and Christianity according to this humanistic story is not the competition on claims of truth, but rather human relations gone awry. The blame is not put on Jesus for leaving the right path, but rather on his rabbi, Joshua ben Perahiah. It may be that Jesus' attitude to the hostess symbolizes a discrediting of the Land of Israel, the Torah, or the common Jewish People, but it is regarded as a mistake of a foolish disciple. His rabbi's anger, however, is regarded as disproportional.

Paradoxically, defending the honour of one person led to serious injury to another. Ironically, at the critical moment when the rabbi is finally ready to accept his disciple's attempts at being forgiven and taken back into the community, his simple gesture is misunderstood.

We can easily imagine Joshua ben Perahiah closing his eyes in the middle of the Shema prayer, concentrating on receiving the Kingdom of Heaven (which Jesus frequently preached for), covering his eyes with one hand, reaching his second hand forward as if to say, "Wait a moment," and Jesus was hurt and despaired, thinking he was expelled again.

The interactions are then reversed: the rabbi goes to his disciple and asks him to repent, but it is too late. The disciple now brings up the lesson he learned from his rabbi: "Whoever sinned and caused others to sin is deprived of the power of doing penitence."

The lesson our sages wished to teach us through this story is that sometimes rebellion against home and against religion, and even establishing a competing religion, is not the consequence of a new understanding that contradicts former truths and beliefs, but rather one of personal disappointment and a sense of alienation.

Sometimes, an overreaction to a mistake, instead of correcting it, may worsen the situation. "Whoever sinned and caused others to sin is deprived of the power of doing penitence." This was aimed at deterring sin, but it only blocked the possibility of atonement.

The sages said: "Always let the left hand thrust away and the right hand draw near, not like Joshua ben Perahiah who thrust Jesus away with both his hands." According to the story, he didn't thrust Jesus away with both hands; it was only a misunderstood gesture. But this was exactly a case of thrusting with both hands. In a distressing situation like this, Rabbi Joshua should not have covered his eyes with one hand. Instead of anticipating the Kingdom of Heaven, he should have opened his eyes, seen the human being standing before him and accepted him.

The separation between the two monotheistic religions is a fait accompli. Now it's time for us to use this story to learn how to handle relationships among people of different religions. Concentrating on human relations and enjoying the fact that the public space can contain them all, like the Holiday of Holidays in Haifa or the streets of Canadian cities during Christmas season, can heal historical injuries and overcome the trampling of human dignity caused by the struggle for religious truth.

Ours must be a big, broad and open tent

Gil Troy
in Montreal

History teaches that hatred distorts, perverts and diminishes the hater and the hated. For millennia, the Jewish People have been targeted by an irrational, overwhelming force, what historian Robert Wistrich calls the world's "longest hatred." Tragically, as this anti-Semitism became illegitimate following the Holocaust, it morphed into anti-Zionism and anti-Israelism, what now may be considered the world's "trendiest hatred."

This hip hatred, also known as the delegitimization movement, has emerged as a major obstacle to peace. The systematic anti-Zionist campaign, fuelled by Arab money and now embraced by radical leftists, makes many Jews fear for their lives, abhor compromise, and reduce the world to a reductionist, dualistic with-us-or-against-us paradigm. As victims of this unreasonable evil, Jews must continue denouncing our detractors, while being wary not to be warped by the fight.

Unfortunately, the power of today's continuing anti-Israel anti-Semitism makes too many of us too quick to caricature those with whom we disagree as anti-Israel or anti-Semitic. There are genuine anti-Zionists and anti-Semites in the world. Why recruit more to their ranks by calling sincere critics sworn enemies?

I do not want to live in an Israel or in a Jewish community where dissent is quashed, where with-me-or-against-me politics reigns, where political life becomes about denouncing rebels as foes. Yes, I draw red lines, but I also build a big broad tent – open on all four sides, like Abraham's – with blue-and-white poles, always trying to find common ground among Israel's supporters, even if we have different partisan spins or policy prescriptions.

It pains me to hear U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry denounced as anti-Israel or anti-Semitic. Disagreeing with some Israelis about how best to achieve peace with the Palestinians does not make you an anti-Zionist. Moreover, labelling as an "anti-Semite" someone who has supported Israel publicly for decades, who endorses Israel's right to exist, and whose brother converted to Judaism, is absurd. Such hysteria diminishes us all – and so broadens the term "anti-Semite" as to make it meaningless, thus letting the genuine, evil, anti-Semites off the hook. Just as stretching the term "apartheid" so broadly by applying it to Israel saps it of its racial dimensions and true pejorative power, so, too, does stretching the term "anti-Semite" to apply to Kerry remove the sting from what should be the serious accusation of Jew-hatred.

When I was a student living in Boston in the 1980s, we knew Kerry as Israel's friend – and knew that his brother, Cam, was Jewish. In 1985, when I visited Soviet Jewish Refuseniks who were blocked from immigrating to Israel, as "protection" I wrote into my phone book the "phone numbers" of Cam Kerry, John Kerry, and Ted Kennedy. I made up the numbers, using 617 for the first two and 202 for Kennedy as area codes. In that pre-Internet age, I figured that if I ran into trouble, I would mention their names, and Kerry's Jewish connection, to delude the Soviets into believing I was well-connected.

More broadly, it pains me to hear from Jews who care about Israel how repudiated they feel when they dare dissent about Israeli policy. "I'm tired of going up to friends' cottages or weddings and having them and their parents take jabs at me," a former student with whom I respectfully disagree about Israel's Palestinian policy recently wrote me. "It's this monopolization of 'the' community that 'If you don't support us on this one, you're not one of us' tone... that really put[s] me off."

I recognize the delegitimization movement's toxicity and have warned that more intellectuals, including Jews, are escalating from criticizing Israeli policy to rejecting Israel's right to exist. I also realize that delegitimization most threatens impressionable young Jewish students, some of whom reject Israel to be trendy or popular. But I also recognize the danger of demonizing some of our smartest, most critical, most passionate young people because they disagree with us.

Democracy begins in disputation which is also what the Talmud is all about. We, the people of the Book, should never be the people of the closed black-and-white book, but of a rich, multi-dimensional, open, colourful and welcoming book, distinguishing between true friends and real foes, and encouraging the kind of vibrant debate that made the Talmud the Talmud, and the Jewish People not just survive but thrive.

Repaying the Righteous Gentile

Urban Writer
Avrum Rosensweig

A few nights ago, I met the Pusuma family, a Roma family from Budapest. They have been given refuge in a west-end Toronto church and live in a room that's about 20 feet by 20 feet. Twenty other churches had rejected the request to give them refuge. So far, no shuls have agreed to give refuge to others.

The father, Jozsef, is 43 years old. His mother is Roma (pejoratively known as Gypsy) and his father was Jewish. Jozsef's wife, Timea, 33, is Roma. She has moxie to spare and very deep dark brown eyes, reflecting joy and a terrible history. Their little girl is Lulu. She is six and adorable. Lulu is a child with opinions. Melts your heart.

Jozsef was a human rights activist working for a minister in the European Parliament. His job was to drive throughout Europe to places where Roma had been persecuted and determine what had happened. He takes great pride in the fact he drove four million kilometres to accomplish his goals.

Timea would often take children into their home, some of them Jewish, offering them a warm compassionate place when their parents were working.

One day in 2009, in daytime Budapest, the Pusuma family heard a car enter their courtyard. They saw an intimidating black sedan. Four men jumped out in scary black clothing, "with big shoes" and masks. They were neo-Nazis brandishing bats. When the family came out, they were set upon. Jozsef told me one of them swung a bat at his thigh and smashed into the bone. He said it was incredibly painful. Timea heard a buzzing in her head after taking a blow to her ear. She touched her head and saw "much" blood in her hand. She was woozy.

Timea didn't know where her Lulu was. Where was her 15-month-old baby? She looked around frantically while the neo-Nazis beat them. Then she heard Lulu. She was lying underneath Jozsef. He was protecting their infant from the thugs. He was taking the blows that would have killed their little girl. Like a lion, like a father, like our people tried to do, he was protecting his little girl from evil. The entire event took three minutes. Evil is fast.

Five years ago, the Pusuma family arrived on our shores after reviewing our refugee policy and choosing our nation as their safe place. The first couple of years were fine, but then reality set in. They were scammed by a lawyer who took their money, but failed to process their papers properly. This led to a deportation notice issued by the government.

In time, through the assistance of very good Christians, the Pusumas were offered sanctuary in that west-end church. They moved in and haven't been outside since. They're in hiding. If they go for a stroll, they can be picked up and immediately sent back to Hungary – a country designated by our government as a safe place for its citizens.

In that tiny room, with shelves lined with donated toys, they teach Lulu her studies. Friends from the church drop by. Jozsef's daily regimen includes spending time alone in a dark room, playing the piano, songs from back home. He cries while he plays. He looks tired and in need of vitamin D.

Today, groups of people, including congregants and children from Toronto's Temple Emanu-El, are trying to find freedom inside our borders for the Pusuma family. By the time you read this, the family's story will likely have been told in a number of other media outlets. But a deportation notice still hangs over the heads of this Roma-Jewish family, which sentences them to live in Budapest 2014, where they are remembered well by big-shoed neo-Nazis and hooligans.

Nazi beatings. Remember your Holocaust education and the stories you read about Jewish beatings. Remember your Holocaust education and ugly testimonies about Jewish babies being thrashed to death, and then remember 15-month-old Lulu.

We are a comfortable and accomplished Canadian Jewish community. Use your authority and resources to help the Pusuma family.

Many Righteous Gentiles saved us. Now is our chance to repay them.

Kosher pop-up restaurant to feature fine dining

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Kosher foodies can look forward to a fine-dining pop-up restaurant. March 25 and 26 run by and in support of Dani (Developing Nurturing and Independence).

Catered by Dani Dairy Delights, the restaurant will be run at the Dani Centre at Garnet A. Williams Community Centre in Thornhill. It will seat 50 people per evening and feature a four-course pareve meal.

Dani was started in 2005 by Kathy Laszlo and Susie Sokol to create opportunities for young Jewish adults with physical or cognitive challenges to participate as valued members of the community and enjoy a meaningful and dignified quality of Jewish life.

Dani Dairy Delights, the organization's catering business, began in 2011 as an important part of Dani's day program.

Josh Salmon, a Dani volunteer, said Dani Dairy Delights has catered to homes and offices, and each participant has a job that is based on interests and abilities.

"We provide all of the young adults with the opportunity to take part in the catering business, but we don't force them," he said.

Orders are delivered and payment is collected by the young adults, and the money raised is placed in a business account. The participants pay themselves a nominal salary from the profits, and the rest goes to fund programs.

Salmon said Dairy Delights recently prepared a dinner for 300 people at an abilities seminar.

"We were hired because the organizers wanted to showcase an organization that employs people with special needs," he said.

"We did it as a buffet and served salmon teriyaki, roasted potatoes, pasta, salad, fruit and cookies."

Dani participants acted as sous chefs and did food preparation such as washing, peeling, chopping and slicing, while others did serving, he added.

Dani Dairy Delights also prepares gift baskets and runs a snack kiosk inside the community centre.

"We try to hone in on the kids' skills. Some do repetitive tasks, but they feel accomplished about it. For many, it's the first time they are being looked up to for what they're doing, and the first time they're getting paid."

Salmon conceived the idea for the pop-up restaurant – he's keeping mum about the actual menu – because he was unaware of one ever being done as a fundraiser, he said.

"Kosher diners look for high-level, innovative cuisine, and this is what they're going to get. It will be a culinary experience. All cooking will be done here under the leadership of our resident chef, Orly Abu."

Salmon said Dani has had people come on board as sponsors, and has already raised $20,000.

He said that not only will the food be delicious, but it "will be food for the soul. By attending, you will be helping other people help themselves. That is what Dani is all about. We want a hand up, not a hand out."

Kids turn to social media to save dad's life

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Kevin Block is a kind man who loves spending his time with his wife and two kids. He enjoys being outdoors, sailing and taking his dog for long walks. He's laid back, patient and has a great sense of humour. His biggest joys are his children's achievements and having a great meal.

In June 2013, Kevin, 56, was diagnosed with stage four non-Hodgkin's lymphoma. He has endured countless attempts at various chemotherapies without any success. Kevin's illness has left him unable to work, and as a result, he lost his business – a substantial source of family income.

The family is, therefore, in dire need of financial help.

At the end of January, Kevin's daughter Nadine, 23, and son Jamie, 17, received the devastating news that there was no cure for their father in Canada. They immediately began a social media campaign called "Keeping Kev" to fight for his life.

"Our campaign's mission is to raise the required funds for Kevin to be able to participate in a clinical drug trial only available from the United States. This drug has had great success in the U.S. with his particular type of cancer. This drug trial is not covered by any form of insurance or OHIP. The doctors have exhausted all forms of treatment for my dad in Canada," Nadine said.

She and her brother decided to create Facebook, Twitter and Instagram accounts to share their father's story. In addition, people have been directed to a website where they can take a closer look at Kevin's journey and donate.

"We turned to social media for our campaign because of its fast and easy accessibility to reach the community. Because of the dire urgency of the situation, we needed to raise funds in the quickest way possible," Nadine said.

"We also wanted our campaign to be relevant, effective and capture the interests of people all around the world. In just a few minutes we were able to set up accounts, post our story, pictures and links for everyone to see and access. In 3-1/2 weeks, we have almost 1,000 likes on our Facebook page."

To date, $96,000 has been raised, continuously inching closer to the ultimate goal of $200,000. All of the funds are going directly toward purchasing the drug from the United States, with the goal of putting Kevin's cancer into remission.

The medication alone costs the family $12,500 a month.

The Blocks "are continuously humbled by everyone's generosity and kindness," Nadine said. The community has been trying to assist the family with various initiatives, such as bake sales and Zumba classes, to raise the much-needed funds.

"We constantly receive uplifting emails, Facebook messages and people sharing their own personal stories."

Nadine said her father "has been blown away by all the support he has received thus far. He is so very grateful and appreciative of everybody's generosity, hard work and dedication to the campaign. The fundraiser has had a very positive impact on his health and well-being. It has lifted his spirits enormously."

Kevin has been on the medication for nearly two months.

"According to his oncology team, he is doing really well," Nadine said. "The medication is taking effect, and there have been significant changes in his blood counts and markers of lymphoma. Kevin is already starting to feel much stronger. He is up and about, has more energy and is slowly regaining his strength."

When asked what message she hopes to spread to other young people through her campaign, Nadine said: "Firstly, appreciate every day that you have with your family because you never know when that can be taken away from you. Secondly, never underestimate what you are capable of doing. Almost one month ago, I would never have imagined that my friends, family and I would have created such a success in such a short period of time. Being proactive and positive goes a long way. Thirdly, don't sweat the small stuff. Life is too precious."

President and Chief Executive Officer

UJA Federation OF GREATER TORONTO

The mission of UJA Federation is to preserve and strengthen the quality of Jewish life in Greater Toronto, Canada, Israel and around the world through philanthropic, volunteer and professional leadership. UJA is the only organization in Toronto which focuses on the entire community and has the most powerful means to dynamically respond to crises and carry out breakthrough solutions that change the Jewish world.

UJA is seeking an outstanding leader to set the strategic direction in order to realize its mission, build and sustain its role in the community and Israel, and to lead the Federation into the next generation. The President and CEO will work closely with the Board, donors and key stakeholders to further engage, motivate and expand participation in fundraising, networking and related activities as well, provide oversight and management of all operations, including the review and implementation of financial controls, protocols, policies and processes.

The President and CEO must be a visionary and possess strong leadership, business acumen, fundraising and strategic planning skills. Experience may have been gained in any sector – not-for-profit, academic, government or corporate – providing the candidate has experience working closely and successfully with lay leadership in a not-for-profit environment.

Jewish day schools offer multiple options

"I think I missed out, and I think my parents had to shoulder more of the load, because the messages around the type of human being that they wanted me to be weren't necessarily being reinforced at school."

Stein said academics and the quality of general education at day schools were also a key part of his decision-making process.

"But for me, I think a big part of the decision was what kind of children do I want to raise, and what kind of message do I want to send them about what to value and what to prioritize?"

When it comes to persuading parents that Jewish day school is the best option, Stein said "one of the biggest obstacles is [overcoming] a lack of awareness of how much day schools have changed since the time that they were kids.

"I think the level of education that is available today, it's not just about having a school with a religious curriculum, it's that we have a school that is comparable in terms of academics and other offerings to any other school in the city, the best schools in the city, and on top of that, we have this Jewish component that extends far beyond the academic sphere."

Daniel Held, executive director of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Julia and Henry Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Education, who introduced the panel, told The CJN that the forum was not about marketing individual schools.

"It's about marketing and sharing the word about day schools and the power that day school has for a child's Jewish education and Jewish identity and Jewish upbringing."

Held, an Associated and TanenbaumCHAT graduate, said kids coming out the Jewish day school system have multiple options.

He said over the past 25 years, studies have consistently shown that "Jewish day school is the gold standard of Jewish education and that kids graduate from schools prepared for high school, prepared for college, prepared for the next stage of life."

He added that "Jewish day schools prepare kids for the world, the world Jewishly… [and] academically, in terms of raising mensches and leaders – kids who can think creatively and think intuitively and think widely."

Kayla Saul, one of the five panelists, and Daniel Held, executive director of the Julia and Henry Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Education addressed parents.

Following the announcement of the retirement of Sandy Keshen as President and CEO of Reena, a Transition Committee and The Osborne Group (Professional Executive Search Group) worked closely and diligently to seek a person qualified and capable of carrying forward Sandy's outstanding achievements at Reena. Reena is now happy to announce that the members of the Reena Board of Directors have appointed Mr. Bryan Keshen, B.A. (Hons), B.Ed., M.S.W., as President and CEO of Reena effective May 5th, 2014.

In making this announcement the Board is very confident that Bryan will not only continue, but will expand the excellent work carried on by Reena on behalf of individuals who have a developmental disability.

His professional vision is to build healthy, sustainable Jewish institutions that integrate passion with compassion through innovation, partnerships and resource sharing. This philosophy is evident in reviewing his many successes since entering the field of social services.

Bryan is a graduate of the University of Toronto with a Master of Social Work and is an alumnus of York University Concurrent Education program.

In his 23 years of Jewish communal service, Bryan has worked in partnership with agencies, volunteers and professionals to oversee the expansion of community engagement services. He has facilitated the development, restructuring and start-up of three community centres: Miles Nadal JCC, Prosserman JCC and the Schwartz/Reisman Centre. Bryan lead the largest celebration of Canadian – Israeli relations (Israel 50), and assisted in the year over year growth of the largest Jewish Community Annual Capital and Endowment Campaign in Canada (UJA, Toronto).

His most recent appointment has been with the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto as Vice-President Community Capacity Building.

Reena is currently celebrating its 40th Anniversary Year as a non-profit social service agency dedicated to integrating individuals with developmental disabilities into the mainstream of society with dignity and respect.

Doc reveals Jerusalem's compelling tale

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The subjects of Jerusalem, a documentary that tells the historical, spiritual and multicultural story of the Old City from the point of view of three young women – one Jewish, one Christian and one Muslim – were in Toronto for its Canadian premiere last week.

The 45-minute National Geographic Entertainment film, produced in partnership with the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University (CFHU), takes the viewer on a journey that features some of Jerusalem's most spectacular sites, including the Western Wall, the Dome of the Rock, and Masada.

Narrated by British actor Benedict Cumberbatch, Jerusalem was screened Feb. 25 at the Ontario Science Centre's IMAX Dome theatre. It shows the viewer what makes the city so special in the eyes of three Jerusalemites, Farah Ammouri, who is Muslim, Nadia Tadros, who is Christian, and Revital Zacharie, who is Jewish.

The three women, who attended an intimate reception hosted by CFHU board members Judy Bronfman and Karen Radomski Simpson the night before the screening, were on hand after the Science Centre event to answer questions about their experience making the film and how it has changed their perspectives.

Daniel Ferguson, the Montreal-born writer and director of Jerusalem, said in addition to wanting to produce a film that used breathtaking aerial shots as well as street-level footage to make viewers feel like they had just visited the city, he also wanted to tell a human story, rather than a political one.

"When we started this film, there was a sense among the filmmakers that everyone in North America and certainly in Europe has this kind of Israel-Palestine fatigue," Ferguson said.

He said leaving politics out of the film was less about ignoring the conflict and more about taking a deeper look into why the city is special to nearly half the world's population.

"Instead of making the conflict or the politics front and centre… I think the film needs to be timeless and it needs to answer two questions: why do we love the city in our own way, and how does that inform our understanding of the issues at hand?" he said.

"I think everyone is curious about Jerusalem. I think a lot of people want to go there, but they're frightened by whatever their perception of the security situation is. But the reality is that this is a chance for people to… gain a perspective on the city and obviously, in a limited time, and feel like they've travelled to Jerusalem. That's the real goal."

Ammouri, who is currently attending college in the United States, said that when she speaks to people about where she comes from, they "are very scared to go to Jerusalem, because they think of it as a city of conflict and tension. But we are just approaching Jerusalem from a different perspective, from three girls and how we live our daily lives."

Although the film, five years in the making, aims to explain why the city is so important to the three Abrahamic faiths, it was also a learning opportunity for its three subjects.

"I already had an idea of what Christianity is, but I wasn't very much aware of Judaism," Ammouri said. "Through the film, I was able to meet wonderful people who have changed my view on the Old City and to realize that it is important to everyone."

Tadros said that when she met Ammouri and Zacharie, she was surprised by how many interests they shared.

"I learned that they are a lot like us. We shared the same jokes, we liked the same movies, we go to the same places, so at first I was shocked that we do the same things… I hope everyone in Jerusalem can figure this out," Tadros said.

Zacharie, who was also surprised by how much they had in common with one another, said she believes that more communication between the communities in the Old City's four quarters – Jewish, Muslim, Christian and Armenian – is important.

"We do meet each other – I've met many Arabs in Jerusalem – but I hope that we'll have a chance to speak more and to understand one another's perspectives," Zacharie said.

Jerusalem opens March 7 at the Ontario Science Centre.

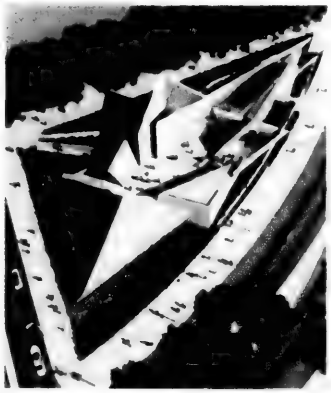
National Holocaust Monument

Design ideas unveiled

CJN Staff

OTTAWA — From an abstract structure that resembles a landed UFO to a sunken plaza, the public had a chance to see six design concepts shortlisted for the National Holocaust Monument to be built in Ottawa next year.

Members of the six international design teams, composed of architects, artists and, in some cases, Holocaust scholars, were on hand at the unveiling, which took place in the lobby of the Canadian War Museum on Feb. 20.



The design proposed for Canada's National Holocaust Monument by Daniel Libeskind and Gail Lord is organized around a stylized Star of David.

A seven-member jury composed of art and urban design professionals, a Holocaust survivor and representation from the National Holocaust Monument Development Council will now recommend its choice to the government. The winning design is expected to be announced this summer.

The monument will be located in the heart of the capital region, at the corner of Wellington and Booth streets, facing the War Museum. The inauguration of the monument's main elements is scheduled for the fall of 2015.

Last May, teams of professional artists and architects were invited to submit their credentials and examples of their work in the first phase of the competition.

The most well known contestant is American architect Daniel Libeskind who designed Berlin's Jewish Museum and the 2007 expansion of the Royal Ontario Museum.

He and museum planner Gail Lord of Toronto call their design "Landscape of Loss, Memory and Survival." They say it is intended to "communicate the hardship and suffering of the victims while conveying a powerful message of humanity's enduring strength."

From an aerial view, intersecting triangles can be seen forming a stylized, six-pointed star, organized around a space large enough to hold gatherings of up to 1,000.

The team led by Iranian-Canadian architect Hossein Amanat and Paris-based Israeli artist Esther Shalev-Gerz proposes a 14-metre-high, 20-metre-wide half-sphere in white marble, positioned at an angle on its end, symbolizing a "broken world" after the Holocaust.

Montreal architect Gilles Saucier, who has worked on such projects in his home city as the Rio Tinto Alcan Planetarium and McGill University's Schulich School of Music, and artist Marie-France Brière have come up with a two-level monument that uses native geology.

Viewers are intended to get the sense of "a large tectonic plate rising out of the ground," suggesting the upheaval of history. The higher plane, which emerges into the light, symbolizes humanity's looking to the future.

The team led by Toronto art historian Irene Szylinger and including artist/architect Ron Arad and architect David Adjaye proposes a series of undulating concrete walls that create 22 narrow pathways, the number of countries where Jews were decimated in the Holocaust. The passages give onto a tranquil space for individual contemplation or large gatherings.

Adjaye, a Tanzanian-born Briton, is the lead designer of the new National Museum of African-American History and Culture in Washington, D.C.

The team, headed by Leslie Klein of Quadrangle Architects of Toronto and American scholar Deborah Dwork, submitted a design with three main elements: an 11-metre-high, gravestone-like granite structure, a small birch forest, which has both historical significance and suggests regeneration; and two art installations – one with video by Israeli artist Yael Bartana, the other featuring sound by Scottish artist Susan Philipsz.

The plan of Cambridge, Mass., architect Julian Bonder and artist Krzysztof Wodiczko entails excavating to the site's bedrock and building a sunken plaza. Aspen trees would be planted in soil that mixes earth from Canada with that from all of the homelands of Canadian Holocaust survivors.

"I am pleased with the high calibre of the teams that have answered our call," said Shelly Glover, minister of Canadian heritage and official languages. "The future National Holocaust Monument will be a lasting symbol for Canadians and visitors to Canada's capital region to remember the horror of the Holocaust and how it affected our history."

Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird added: "This commemoration project will promote a better understanding of the historical events of the Holocaust and how they have affected Canadian history – an understanding that will benefit Canadians in every community across the country."

Everything happens for a reason

Jori Lichtman

I didn't even shed a tear. OK. A really tiny one that wasn't even big enough to make it down my cheek and drip onto my shoulder. Seriously. Everyone reacts differently to life-changing news. And when the news was delivered to me that my services (along with the services of 59 other employees) were no longer needed at the organization I had, in many ways, grown up with for eight years, my reaction was, and still is, everything happens for a reason.

In fact, one of the 613 mitzvot, or commandments, is not to bear a grudge. I'm confidently upholding that one (along with the 612 others of course). I truly believe I will land where I'm supposed to land – at a great company, in a challenging marketing role that leverages my creative talents, leadership skills and go-getter attitude.

So why am I writing here today? Not because it pays the Hebrew day school bills (sure, every bit helps). But because I think there may be other young Jewish professionals in a similar situation who would benefit from hearing my story – my journey.

In fact, perhaps there are some readers out there who are also members of the Facebook group called The Tribe – Young Jewish Professionals Group, a group I stumbled upon, a "volunteer-driven group focused on fostering community engagement and building personal and professional relationships within Toronto's young Jewish professional community." Or perhaps you're not in this situation today, but you may be one day.

In the three months since I received the fateful message in a jet-lagged state (it was the day after arriving back from an amazing 10-day trip to Israel with my husband), I have met numerous other talented professionals who have faced a similar challenge. This group includes an old colleague who is charting a new, exciting path as a life and executive coach using me to test her talents on. Yenta the Matchmaker could not have made a better match – she wants to practise her coaching skills, and I want someone smart to give me honest, constructive feedback and advice.

So, what exactly am I up to these days? What haven't I been up to! I'm reading books and taking workshops to discover my greatest skills and what makes me happiest. I completed an online course in social media and received an industry-recognized certification. I joined an important industry association and developed a new mentor relationship with someone I clicked with at a networking event. I'm networking my tush off meeting dozens of professionals by phone, email, LinkedIn and personal introductions, and attending events through my Rotman MBA alumni network.

I'm leveraging my Jewish network to make connections and introductions – including telling all the moms and dads at my kids' school that I'm actively looking for my next great role. I'm keeping track of all my contacts, coffee dates and thank-you notes, and conducting hours of research on many organizations, especially the ones that are at the top of my list.

And probably most importantly, I've created a list of my top 10 professional goals for 2014. It's tacked to my bulletin board in my office at home, staring me in the face each day. They're not complicated and they're realistic. Of course, the first one is to land a great job I'm excited about.

Another goal is to attend four networking or professional development sessions this year. And another is to make one coffee date per month with a new connection or someone I want to re-connect with.

Speaking of coffee dates, I recently learned about the Canadian site www.tenthousandcoffees.com. It's a forum that helps connect young professionals with industry leaders and experts. The industry leaders sign themselves up – they want to help. Let's take them up on their generosity. Because as we all know, time is the most precious commodity.

Of course, as motivated as I am to get results, I don't have it all figured out. I make mistakes. I sometimes get nervous for interviews. I sometimes cram too much in one day and forget to breathe. I should meditate. I will. I made a promise to myself. But my mom and dad still think I'm the best, of course. Not to mention my husband, my biggest supporter of all!

With all this going on, homemade chicken soup with matzah balls is on the stove every week, and I would never miss a Shabbat dinner with my family.

And even if I've had a rough day, or a meeting didn't go as planned, I always remember God has given me so much to be thankful for – a loving and supportive husband, three beautiful and healthy children, and friends and family who are always there to lend an ear. I also have the amazing opportunity to be home when my kids get home from school, share their projects and artwork, and sing their beautiful Jewish songs.

Just the other week, I attended my son's incredible senior kindergarten Shabbat celebration at Robbins Hebrew Academy where he and his classmates performed Hebrew songs along with choreographed dances recognizing God's six days of creation and the seventh day of rest.

There, the tears came.

OPTIONS FOR KIDS SEEKING LEGAL HELP AND FOR PARENTS DENIED ACCESS

Family Matters
by
John Syrtash
B. A. (Hon), LL B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 32 years

Question: I am fifteen years old. I am currently living with my father and stepmother. I do not live with my mother because of a drug addiction she has had in the past and her failure to appear in court over custody of me. My mother has no custody of me, only visitation rights. I am truly unhappy living with my father because he emotionally abuses me, yet I do not want to live with my mother either. I would really love to live with my grandmother but I doubt it's possible. I have seen many counsellors and psychologists, yet nothing helps me. I have even contacted children's aid and they do not want to bother with my case either. I just need a place to live where I can feel safe and loved, which is why I would like to live with my grandmother. I feel like my feelings do not matter and I cannot understand why it is so difficult for me to just be happy. Please help me.

Answer: Youth between the ages of 12-17 who need their own lawyers in certain family law situations or in criminal law matters can turn to Justice for Children and Youth, an agency of the Ontario Ministry of Children and Youth Services, by calling 416-920-1633 to see if they can help. They are very kind and helpful.

Question: I have court papers saying that I am allowed to have my son every second weekend. One day my son, who is 10, decided he didn't want to see me anymore. The last time I went to see my son he was not there. My ex told me that the next time I come I have to make an appointment to see him. I called him during the holidays and was talking to him for a few seconds, then the phone went dead. I called back right away but nobody picked up the phone. I pay a lot for child support. Why bother paying the support if I cannot see my son? Is there anything I can do?

Answer: In law, you are obliged to pay child support even if you are denied access. But I would recommend that you ask a judge to cite your wife for contempt of court for breaching the court order and threaten her with jail or a large fine if she continues to prevent you from seeing your son. The court could also ask a child therapist to investigate your son's true wishes.

Study finds stem cells that may lead to leukemia

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

The discovery of a stem cell that evades therapy and may trigger acute leukemia and relapses among patients in remission could potentially help stop the disease in its early stages, according to a new study from the Princess Margaret Cancer Centre that builds on research by a former Israeli medical resident.

Dr. Liran Shlush currently works at Princess Margaret, but his leukemia research began when he was completing his internal medicine residency at the Rambam Medical Center in Haifa.

Shlush is now part of a team under the leadership of John Dick that began studying acute myeloid leukemia (AML) cells with a general curiosity, not knowing what they would find.

Dick's team sequenced the genomes of AML samples and compared them with what was supposed to be a lineage of white blood cells unaffected by the disease.

That's when they discovered a mutation in the gene DNMT3a in 25 per cent of AML patients. That mutation causes pre-leukemic stem cells to appear as though they are normal cells, but they grow at an abnormal rate.

"That was the 'eureka moment,'" Shlush said.

Essentially, Dick's team has discovered a stage that is a precursor to the appearance or reappearance of leukemia in a patient.

AML occurs when white blood cells mutate and divide too rapidly. When you look at them through a microscope, they're actually composed of different sub-populations of cells that are genetically distinct, Shlush said.

It's hard to diagnose leukemia early on, Shlush said, because its cells circulate in a patient's bloodstream without any tangible or visible structure, such as a tumour, unlike many other forms of cancer.

"The patients [usually] come into the clinic with the full-blown disease," Shlush said. "No one knows what is the first mutation that started it all, but now we have a genetic marker we can test."

The team hopes its discovery will allow for earlier diagnoses and, therefore, increased survival rates.

All of the findings are very preliminary, Shlush emphasized. There aren't any drugs to target the rogue cells yet, and it's still extremely difficult to determine if people have them.

But the team's discovery could pave the way to some really significant findings in the future, and perhaps even a cure.

For now, the researchers will continue to study the disease using their discovery as a starting point to advance personalized cancer medicine by identifying who might be at risk.

JGH campaign decreases chance of medical mistakes

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Little did Bernie Weinstein realize that an incorrect dosage of medication given to his mother-in-law at the Jewish General Hospital (JGH) in 2002 would ultimately contribute to a program that is reducing medical errors and "adverse events" at the JGH, other hospitals and even overseas.

Bernie Weinstein

The two-year-old Speak Up! campaign, run by the hospital's Quality Program, allows hospital "stakeholders" – patients, families and clinicians – to work together to minimize medical mistakes and near-misses, reduce patient fears and enhance inter-communication.

It does so through a co-ordinated team effort that fends off friction between parties in favour of co-operation, mutual respect and more informed participation.

And it is proving so popular that another Montreal hospital, the Montreal General, is implementing its own Speak Up! program – as is a hospital in Asia, Weinstein said.

Hospitals in Ontario, Alberta and Manitoba, as well as in the United States, have also have launched their own versions of Speak Up!

JGH information indicates that preventable adverse events and medical errors contribute to the deaths of up to 24,000 Canadians each year.

"It's... the patient who must be the focal point," said Weinstein, 66, who chairs Speak Up! at JGH and is currently giving a series of public talks on the campaign through the end of April. "It's not just about 'speaking up,' but also about 'active listening' by doctors, nurses, caregivers, and families.

"It is all about a continuous process of education and reinforcement," he said.

Designer helps brides' dreams come true

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

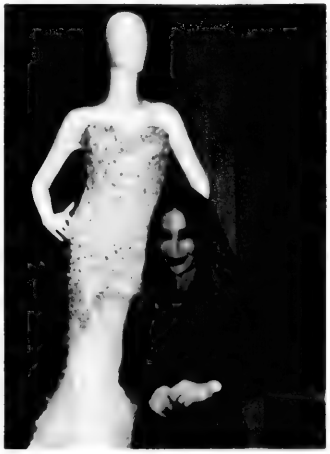
Israel-based fashion designer Pnina Tornai's exclusive wedding designs were showcased at United Jewish Appeal's Young Leaders and Young Women's Leadership cocktail evening on Feb. 20.

Tornai, who stars in the successful New York-based reality TV show Say Yes to the Dress, began her career 25 years ago in a small Tel Aviv shop where she designed dresses, working with only one additional seamstress. Today, she owns a high-end design studio in New York City, attracting brides from all over the globe – including the Arab world, Asia, Europe and Canada.

Visiting Canada for the first time for the event, held at the Shangri-La Hotel, Tornai thanked the Jewish community of Toronto. "I believe that Israel would not exist if we didn't have the Jews and the Diaspora, especially those who live in America and Canada, who support and donate so much to Israel."

Tornai has never studied design, but she began designing clothes instinctively at a very young age.

"My parents realized my gift and talent when I was four years old," she told the 60 women at the event. "I used to draw and sketch dresses – especially ball gowns – on the walls of our house."



Fashion designer Pnina Tornai is seen with one of her exclusive wedding gown creations.

It was really a mistake, she said. "I wanted to be an actress. God decides for us what we should do, and I personally very quickly understood you don't argue with Him. The profession literally chose me – I didn't choose the profession.

"It started with a dream," she continued. "I was lying on the lawn and I saw these dresses falling from the sky – amazing bridal dresses. I was looking at them, and I could see every detail on those dresses. I woke up in the morning and I understood it was a calling. That morning, I went to the store, and I said to my one salesperson: 'We are closing the store.' I painted the store in white and gold. I found a seamstress who said she knew how to sew wedding dresses, and that's how it started."

Tornai said another sign from God came when she sold her first dress.

"My first bride came and bought a dress for her wedding. The following day, her wedding was featured in the front page of all the newspapers. She got married in the north [of Israel] and had rockets flying over her head at the chupah. The newspapers wrote about the couple that got married under fire. That's how my dress ended up in all the newspapers."

Tornai's global success came in 2005 when she was offered an opportunity to sell her dresses at the New York wedding gown giant, Kleinfeld Bridal Salon.

Calling Israel home, she travels each month back and forth from Tel Aviv to New York City.

"I think my dresses are so successful because of the spirit and soul I put in. They also have a certain style. I was the first one to start with the corset in the U.S. Most brides feel the most beautiful they could feel on the day of their wedding. That I made their dream come true is the greatest compliment to me."

Tornai's designs also include eveningwear. Her handmade dresses are designed using the principles of haute couture. Materials are imported from all parts of the world, with designs ranging from classic to sophisticated that include trimmings with Swarovski stones, lace and other fabrics. Tornai also designs modest dresses for Orthodox brides.

Hudson's Bay is set to launch a 20,000-square-foot Kleinfeld Bridal Salon at its flagship downtown Toronto store on May 1.

"You're not going to have to go to New York to buy your dresses, because we are going to have Pnina Tornai exclusively in Canada and we are very proud of that. Everything but the groom – that is what I want to deliver to the Canadian bride," said Evelyn Reynolds, senior vice-president of bridal licensing and business development at Hudson's Bay.

Tornai is extending her brand. She's working on a bathing suit and lingerie line in Israel, as well as on developing a perfume

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING
The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

AUTHORS & POETS
The CJN is pleased to announce its Annual Passover Literary Supplement

We invite readers to submit unpublished, original works of fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes.

They should not exceed 2,000 words. Selected submissions will appear in the Passover Supplement of The CJN on April 10 2014, in either our Montreal or our Toronto edition, or both. If you have a preference, please state it on your submission. Not all submissions can be published. We look for originality. Please don't send more than three entries.

Ari Shavit

Author tries to help Israel find its narrative

Israeli journalist Ari Shavit's new book, My Promised Land, The Triumph and Tragedy of Israel, is being hailed for its historic sweep and insights into the Israeli experience. Shavit was in Toronto recently, and he discussed his award-winning book with The CJN's Paul Lungen.

Can you tell us what the book is about, why you wrote it?

I wrote this book because I felt what happened to us is that we've lost our narrative. Israel was a narrative before it was an entity. We had a very strong sense of where we were coming from and why there is a need to build a home for the homeless people that we were. And what happened, sadly, over the years is that while Israel physically grew stronger, its sense of meaning and narrative disintegrated in many ways.

So what I tried to do in this book, in my own way, is to rewrite a narrative, to look at the larger picture of our existence.

My point is that we got lost in the friction, in the conflict, in the debates over the territories, the settlements, the religious issues, and we lost sight of the great miracle that Israel is.

The book is about getting the story back. I think the way I do it is by telling the life stories of different Israelis, reflect the different aspect of our lives, the different aspects of our history. And I think by doing it, I want to enable readers who care about Israel to refresh a renewed interest in this country, to see how magical it is, that with all its faults and problems and flaws, how remarkable it is. And really to bring back the love of Israel, especially to those who were alienated by Israeli policies in the last decades.

You talk in your book about Israelis' existential fear. Are you an optimist or a pessimist about peace with Israel's neighbours?

My claim is that contemporary Israel is defined by two unique situations. One is occupation. The other is intimidation. And my claim is that while people on the left tend to focus on occupation and ignore intimidation, people on the right tend to emphasize intimidation and ignore occupation. I think the realistic approach called for is to address both, to see that the uniqueness of the Israeli situation is shaped, is defined by these two elements.

On the one hand, we are the one democracy that rules over another people. On the other, we are the only democracy and probably one of the only nations in the world that is really existentially threatened. This is a fundamental feature of our being. Now I'm not saying that peace is impossible, but I think that the conflict between us and our neighbours is a very deep one. I oppose occupation and have to deal with it, but I don't think this is a conflict over occupation or settlements.

I think it's a deep conflict that has a historic dimension, and it has to do with the identity of both sides. There are religious elements in it, cultural elements in it. There is the element of tension between a Jewish state and an Islamic world; the conflict or tension between a Jewish nation state and the Arab world; and there is the conflict between the Zionist state and the Palestinians. All these create a conflict that I don't think can be easily resolved.

I think a realistic approach to peace is needed. And my approach is basically the following: try what [U.S.] Secretary [of State John] Kerry is now trying, which is to achieve a final status agreement, but don't wait for this to happen.

If I were in power, I would prepare in advance Plan B, a different approach which is based not on solving all the core issues, but rather to move forward in a sort of gradual, cautious, creative process where we gradually deal with occupation while the Palestinians gradually build their state.

So if peace cannot be achieved this year, I think we should not fall into despair, but we should try to design some new peace approach [in] which we pull out gradually from parts of the West Bank and give the Palestinians more and more space, geographic space, economic space, political space. So at every given moment the Palestinians will have more than they had before, but they will not have everything.

And then hopefully, after we go through this long process, we are able to go for the final reconciliation, which I doubt we can reach right now.

Why would the Palestinians have any incentive to negotiate a peace agreement if you're handing over territories and powers? Is there reciprocity?

I support the prime minister's position, unlike many of my peers and friends. I think the Palestinians should recognize Israel as a Jewish state. It is very important, because it will signal to Palestinian youngsters that we Jews belong on the land.

If an interim agreement cannot be achieved, I think this kind of situation that moves us toward a two-state solution to create two states, improves our position and improves their position.

It improves our position because it deals with the moral issue of occupation, it deals with the demographic problem of controlling another people, and mainly with a problem Israel has now with its legitimacy.

Do you see a danger that your approach will heighten divisions within Israel?

I think the point is there is another people there and we cannot ignore that. If we ignore that, we actually risk the entire Zionist enterprise. If you look today at the new world we are facing, Israel has three main external threats. The first one is Iran. I'm very firm on the Iranian issue. I think it's a dramatic threat.

The second one is occupation, which is killing us quietly and gradually.

And the third one, which has to do with occupation, is Israel's legitimacy. If we are to regain our international legitimacy, we must deal with occupation. That would also enable us to deal with Iran.

I'm not one of those people on the left who are into settler-bashing. I respect many of the settlers. But I think they made a fundamental historic mistake, although they had the best intentions. They totally failed in convincing the world that there is justification for their endeavour. As a result, they are putting Israel's legitimacy in jeopardy. They do not mean that, they do not want that, but this is the outcome. If we do not deal with occupation, we will lose international support, and when we need it to deal with the real existential issues, like Iran and others, we will have no allies.

Can you comment on the social protest movement in Israel a few summers ago?

I think that of all the world's social protest movements, Israel's was the most remarkable. It was civilized, it was moderate, it was reasonable. It had very wide support.

Ari Shavit

I saw in this really the awakening of Israeli civil society. I think we have a great people, I think we have flawed politics. And this was a summer-long occasion where you saw the eruption of the power and the energy of civil society in Israel, demanding deep change.

I think there was a conceptual revolution. The mindset of Israelis has changed. I think in the future we will see new forces that will emerge from that movement. So, no it wasn't an event of one summer, although the demonstrators are not out in the street, they really changed our psyche.

The capitalist revolution in Israel went too far and we let the market be our ruler. Here was a demand to have the state back, not like extreme socialism, but to strike the right balance with I would say is a kind of social democratic undertone to it. It was proof of the strength and vitality of Israeli society, and I think we'll see more coming as a result of it.

Digging up Jerusalem

Past Forward
Alex Gropper

The period after the Six Day War proved to be a bonanza for the archeology of Jerusalem. Between 1948 and 1967, Israeli archeologists were denied access to the Old City, and it was in east Jerusalem that the most desirable archeological sites were found.

Between 1961 and 1967, it was the British who conducted the most important excavations in east Jerusalem under the leadership of the legendary archeologist Kathleen Kenyon. Her assistant director, A. D. Tushingham, would become the chief archeologist, at Toronto's renowned Royal Ontario Museum. Because of him, the Globe and Mail made their excavations known across Canada. Their work was brought to a halt by the Six Day War of 1967.

The year 1967 was a turning point in the archeology of Jerusalem. For the first time, Israeli archeologists had a chance to take the lead in excavating the city that lay at the heart of Jewish history. It was a task they took up with gusto.

Excavations began at the Western Wall right after the Six Day War, under the legendary Benjamin Mazar, the dean of Israeli archeologists. In the 1950s, Mazar had been the president of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, where he also headed the prestigious Institute of Archaeology. Mazar's excavations revealed the scope and breadth of occupation around the Temple Mount, especially the massive platform built by Herod the Great for his impressive reconstruction of the Second Temple, which would be destroyed by the Romans in 70 CE.

Another important excavation project in Jerusalem's Old City was undertaken in 1969 by another pioneer of Israeli archeology, Nachman Avigad. His spectacular discoveries spanned more than 1,000 years of Jerusalem's history, starting with the Broad Wall dating to the time of Hezekiah, king of Judah, in the late eighth century BCE. Avigad also discovered the Burnt House, a palatial dwelling destroyed by the Romans in the upper city when they sacked the Second Temple. He capped it off with the excavation of the Byzantine Cardo of the fifth and sixth centuries CE. Avigad's work visibly illuminated a large part of Jerusalem's history.

Jerusalem's earliest history, at the City of David, was uncovered by the charismatic Yigal Shiloh, who directed these excavations from the late 1970s until the mid-1980s. In the process, Shiloh found the earliest habitation of Jerusalem dating from the dawn of recorded history c. 3,000 BCE. He also uncovered the massive Stepped Stone Structure that rose over six stories on the City of David's eastern slope. With his work, Shiloh unleashed a hornet's nest of controversy when ultra-Orthodox haredim accused him of disturbing a cemetery. Their protests almost brought the dig to a halt with worldwide headlines describing it as the "War of the Bones." Tragically Shiloh died of cancer when he was barely 50, prematurely cutting short what was a brilliant career.

Recently the City of David excavations were resumed by Eilat Mazar, the capable granddaughter of Benjamin Mazar. She made sensational headlines around the world when she claimed to have found the remains of David's palace.

TEMPLE
Emanu-El
קהילת עמנו-אל

Director of Centre
for Jewish Living and Learning
Temple Emanu-El, Toronto, ON, Canada

We are a Reform-affiliated congregation in Toronto, at a stage in our synagogue life in which we are energized by and dedicated to educational transformation and renewal. Our goal is to inspire our youth to become engaged liberal Jews.

We are seeking a progressive educator able to foster a holistic Jewish learning experience for our families within the context of our religious school.

The Director of Jewish Living and Learning will possess an imaginative view of the possibilities of Jewish pedagogy. Integral to this vision will be the exploration of alternative learning, family education, parallel parent/child learning and informal learning experiences. The successful applicant will have significant experience in education and leadership, will be passionate about Israel and will have a vision for Jewish learning. Fluency in Modern Hebrew is highly valued, as is a background in the youth movement.

The Director's role includes oversight of our one day/week Religious school, midweek Hebrew program, and family holiday and Shabbat programming, corresponding to approximately 25 hours/week. Our Bnei Mitzvah Coordinator and our Teen Engagement Coordinator report to the Director. The hours are flexible. Salary will be commensurate with experience and qualifications.

Interested candidates should submit a letter of interest, resume and two references to DirectorSearch@templeemanuel.ca.
We will begin reviewing applications on March 25, 2014, and will consider candidates till the position is filled.

Purim forever

Midrashic Moments
Rachael Turkienicz

The holiday of Purim is one of the most joyous and mysterious holidays in our calendar. Certainly we all remember the story of being victorious over the evil Haman who plotted to eradicate the Jewish people. The hero, Esther, and her uncle, Mordechai, represent complex Jewish portraits of transformation.

It is customary to dress in costumes, drink excessively, feast, give treats to each other and give charity to the poor. Of course, we listen to the reading of the Megillah and we boo and stomp to eradicate the sound and memory of Haman, who is considered part of Amalek.

In short, we are partying, engaged in ritual, drinking, booing and hissing, eating and delivering treats. Indeed, we celebrate this holiday in a very unique Jewish style.

In fact, the story itself has already put us into a mood of confusion and disorientation. When the sages tell us that our goal is to not know the difference between "cursed is Haman" and "blessed is Mordechai," it's because the story itself moves them in and out of each other's shoes. Mordechai is deserving of a promotion for saving the king's life, but it's Haman who gets the promotion. The king plans a reward for Mordechai and asks Haman for his opinion, and Haman believes the king is referring to him. The king gives his ring to Haman to seal the decree to kill the Jews and later gives his ring to Mordechai to seal the decree to defend the Jews. The topsy-turvy plot unfolds with layers and layers of inversions.

But let's not forget Esther and the Megillah's only other woman of significance, Vashti. Once again, the text shows us mirrors and inversions. Vashti disappears because she does not come to the king when she's summoned, whereas Esther's danger is that she will visit the king when she's not summoned. Vashti is hosting a feasting party for the women at the start of the book, while we read that Esther is fasting and her maidens are likewise fasting with her.

The ridiculousness of the royal antics reach their climax when we realize that all the marital advice is coming from a group called "sarisim," which translates as eunuchs.

All of this raises the obvious question that we have been asking ourselves for centuries: what are we supposed to make of all of this?

One of the answers can be found in the Megillah itself. It is a literary document, and as with any good literature, it will state its theme near the start and quite clearly. The beginning of the Megillah says that this is the story of this empire that spans from "Hodu to Kush, one hundred and twenty seven provinces." In other words, this is the story of exile. It's a story of political intrigue and confusion. It's a story where you're never completely sure what will unfold, and one minute the hero of the story is the villain and the popular villain has become the hero. It's a reality of shaky ground and broken promises. If we forget for a moment what exile is, if we trust it as the answer, we're doomed, and it will devour us.

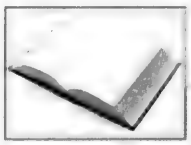
We celebrate this knowledge and we defend ourselves with education (by reading the Megillah) and strengthening our community (sending treats). The key to Jewish survival is our ability to navigate the world around us as we bring the values of Torah into the world and not isolate ourselves from it.

This might be one reason why the sages in the Talmud determined that even after the Messiah comes and we no longer celebrate Jewish holidays, we will nonetheless celebrate Purim forever.

Rachael Turkienicz is director of Rachaelscentre.org.

Play and the wisdom of children

Rabbi Rena Arshinoff



Rabbinic Reflections

Pirkei Avot asks: who is wise? The second-century scholar Shimon ben Zoma answers, "One who learns from everyone," based on Psalm 119:99, "from all who would teach me have I gained understanding." This persuades us to ask: what do we learn from children?

In my work with grieving children, I always reflect afterward, thinking, "out of the mouths of babes…" as I marvel at their often brilliant insights when they try to understand significant losses in their lives.

We often talk about how children say and do remarkable things, and indeed, we learn a great deal from them. We know how important play is – they explore their world through play. But as adults, we forget this. We all like to have fun, but how often do we as adults allow ourselves to be carefree and childlike?

As we watch children, we see their absolute honesty and ability to just be who they are. Some of the things they learn through play are sharing, thinking of others, releasing emotions, imitating adults, apologizing for being too forceful or greedy, accepting an apology from others, and forgiving. These are concepts Judaism teaches, but such learning does not always come easy.

We each have an "inner child" that is full of energy and somewhat whimsical. We do have a fun side, but finding it can be a challenge for some of us. Children don't need permission to play – they do it naturally, but as adults, we need to tell ourselves that play is acceptable and even beneficial at times. We can even evaluate ourselves in this playful context by asking: how do I play with others? Do I share? Am I a bully? Do I say I am sorry if needed? Do I help others? If others apologize, can I accept?

Children love to laugh. Laughter moves energy and releases endorphins that make us feel good. What a wonderful feeling after being silly or having a giant laugh. Although not always appropriate, sometimes it can even help to laugh at ourselves. God does not expect perfection – God expects us to have an openness to learn how we can be our best. The idea of laughing at ourselves helps us to realize: "How could I have done such a ridiculous thing?" and, most importantly: "How will I be better next time?"

Children readily use their imagination and allow new ideas to simply appear, and such freedom brings new insights. Adults can also do this in finding new ways to fulfil mitzvot, in exploring new and unique concepts in Torah study, in establishing new social justice initiatives, and even in trying to make sense of life's challenges. Children teach us a great deal by simply being who they are in their uninhibited and delightful ways, even in difficult times.

Yes, children have their difficulties as well. Judaism focuses on making the world a better place. The approaching holiday of Purim reminds us that we need not be so serious all the time. Play offers new understandings and children teach us wonderful approaches to doing this. May we have the openness to learn from their open and genuine wisdom.

The rest of the story

Rabbi Philip Scheim

From the Bimah
Rabbi Philip Scheim

The veteran American radio commentator Paul Harvey would end his broadcasts with his trademark phrase: "And now you know the rest of the story."

The story I share now begins almost four decades ago in my student years at the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) in New York. One of the more interesting personalities at the seminary was a bookseller named Shimon Gruber, a Skverer Chassid, who would wander the halls, his hands filled with talmudic and chassidic commentaries and assorted Judaic texts. In truth, I was one of Reb Shimon's best customers. It was difficult for me to resist his sales pitch, in which he proclaimed his books to be "scientifish," because of the presence of an index, knowing that JTS favoured an academic approach to text study.

In my years at the seminary, I acquired numerous "metziahs" (bargains), as he would term them, books that I can attest to never having opened even once. At the time of purchase, I knew that I would make little use of Animals in the Mishnah, and other less-than-riveting works that Reb Shimon sold me, but I liked him, and enjoyed the opportunity to exercise my limited Yiddish. It is interesting that it never occurred to me – or my fellow students – to question how a Skverer Chassid ended up selling books at JTS.

Some 20 years ago, my cherished rabbinic colleague, the late Rabbi Joseph Kelman, happened to be in my office. As rabbis tend to do when visiting other rabbis' offices, he was browsing my bookshelves, picked up an obscure volume and asked: "Where did you get this?"

Assuming that my answer would mean nothing to Rabbi Kelman, who had not attended JTS, I said: "From Reb Shimon."

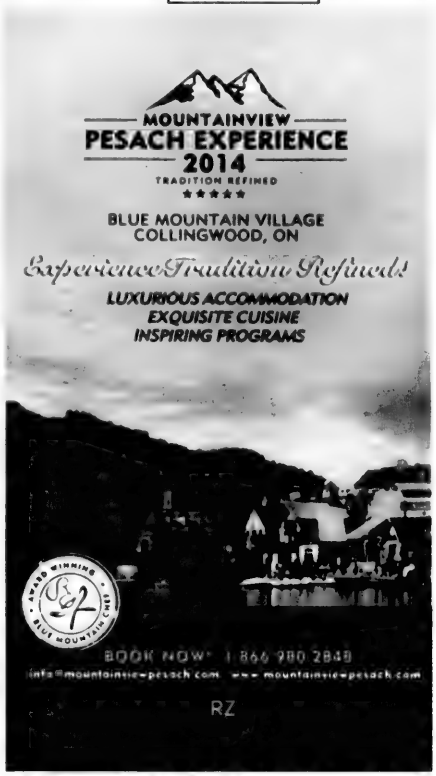
"Oh, you mean Shimon Gruber," he said.

"You know Shimon Gruber?" I responded in surprise.

He told me that Shimon Gruber had been one of the German Jewish refugees interned in Canada by the British during the Holocaust. The Kelman family in Toronto was instrumental in seeking the release of these Jewish refugees, and in assisting many of them upon their release. Many of those former internees would become distinguished leaders in Jewish communal life in Canada and beyond. Many became highly successful, but some, like Shimon Gruber, who ended up in New York, were struggling to find their place in life.

It was here that the Kelman family connection would prove significant. Rabbi Wolfe Kelman, of blessed memory, long-time executive vice-president of the Rabbinical Assembly, was based at the Jewish Theological Seminary. He took it upon himself to find a worthy occupation for Reb Shimon, and suggested that the seminary could use a bookseller.

And now you know the rest of the story. For decades, Shimon Gruber sold books to seminary students and faculty. I own many of them. Indeed, there were many times when I questioned my purchases. But my questioning ended once I learned how Reb Shimon came to the seminary, how it was the result of compassion and caring that, for decades, every weekday, a Chassid travelled the distance from New Square to Morningside Heights, from Chassidism to Conservative Judaism. Those "Gruber-metziahs" that I had denigrated years earlier, I would learn, of all my books, were the most precious and the most sacred.



Crimea's sole rabbi speaks out

Jews should 'not become targets'

Amanda Borschel-Dan
The Times of Israel

The sole rabbi in the Crimean peninsula said Sunday he is advising his congregation to stay indoors and away from the centre of Simferopol, the capital of Ukraine's Crimean republic and the epicentre of the Russian invasion, where hundreds of soldiers were deployed by Russian President Vladimir Putin on Saturday.

Speaking to the Times of Israel from the relatively quiet outskirts of Simferopol, Rabbi Michael Kapustin, an ordained Reform rabbi, said there is an atmosphere of fear in the city, with few cars and fewer pedestrians on the streets.

Located in the heart of Simferopol's Old City, Rabbi Kapustin's Ner Tamid synagogue was vandalized on Thursday night with anti-Semitic graffiti, including swastikas, "Death to the Jews" and far-right extremist emblems. The rabbi said the attack was anti-Semitic in nature, but likely not carried out by a member of any far-right party, since the emblems were apparently "botched."

Friday night, Rabbi Kapustin and the few members of his congregation who arrived for Shabbat evening prayers lit candles and said a prayer for peace. The rabbi subsequently asked his congregants to go home, and he cancelled Saturday morning prayers in an effort to keep his members out of danger zones.

Synagogue in Simferopol, Crimea, defaced with Nazi graffiti

"I would say the situation is dangerous – a lot of things might happen," said Kapustin, who is sending his wife and two small children, 1-1/2 and nine months of age, to Israel on Monday.

Rabbi Kapustin has asked his congregation not to voice any political opinions in public, either pro-Russian or pro-Ukrainian nationalist, and not to make targets of themselves.

But he did not hold back. "As a rabbi, I am in the public eye. I am not afraid to speak. I am a patriot of this country and I believe what is happening is an aggression on the part of Russia," Kapustin said.

The rabbi was born in Russia but raised in Georgia. In 1991-92 he and his family fled to Ukraine as refugees. He subsequently studied in England and Israel, but returned to Ukraine to serve those he calls his countrymen.

"Now basically I am the only rabbi left in the Crimea and I look after anything Jewish. I'm talking about thousands of people," Rabbi Kapustin said.

He asks the Jewish communities of the world to support Ukraine and the Jewish communities of Ukraine and Crimea, which "is under aggression from Russia." He specifically asks that Diaspora Jews speak with their governments and demand sanctions against Russia.

"We are very poor and miserable, but it's not a question of money, it's a question of freedom," Rabbi Kapustin said.

According to the Joint Distribution Committee, there are an estimated 17,000 Jews in Crimea today, mostly located in Simferopol, Sevastopol, Feodosia and Yalta.

Religious communities ask Russia to pull troops

JTA

Religious communities in Ukraine, including the Jewish community, called on Russia to "stop its aggression against Ukraine" and pull out its troops.

The religious communities also appealed to the international community, including the United States, Great Britain, the European Union, the United Nations and the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe, to "stop foreign invasion into Ukraine and brutal interference into our internal affairs."

Rabbi Jacob Dov Bleich, president of the Jewish Federation of Ukraine and a chief rabbi in the country, was among the signatories of the letter circulated by the Institute for Religious Freedom. Other signatories include the heads of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church of the Kyivan Patriarchate; the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church; the Evangelical Baptist Union of Ukraine; the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Ukraine; and the Ukrainian Lutheran Church.

"Dear Brothers and Sisters in Russia: The Ukrainian people have only friendly, fraternal feelings toward the Russian people. Do not believe the propaganda that enflames hostility between us. We want and we will continue to build friendly and fraternal relations with Russia but only as a sovereign and independent state," the letter states.

Meanwhile, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee said Sunday that it has activated emergency plans to help needy Jews in Crimea, which is home to about 17,000 Jews who live in and around Simferopol, Sevastopol, Feodosia and Yalta. The assistance includes delivering food and medicine to the homes of elderly and poor, establishing emergency phone chains and increasing security around Jewish community centres.

The JDC said in a statement that it has "prepared appropriate contingency plans in case the situation worsens."

In a statement released Friday, Rabbi Michael Kapustin of the Ner Tamid Reform synagogue in Simferopol, in the Crimean Peninsula, said he would go to his synagogue to light candles even though services were cancelled for security reasons.

"The city is occupied by Russians. Apparently Russians intend to take over the Crimea and make it a part of Russia," Kapustin said. "If this were the case, I would leave the country. In this case, I will leave this country since I want to live in democratic Ukraine."

Beyond nuclear: The threat of Iranian terrorism

Sheryl Saperia
Special to The CJN

Negotiations over Iran's nuclear program have dominated headlines worldwide. With the debate inundated with references to break-out times, heavy-water plants and centrifuges, it would be understandable if some observers lost track of the core issue of this crisis: the threat is not so much the weapon as the regime that owns it.

Under the leadership of Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran manages a huge industry of torture; executes its poets, children, and dissidents; persecutes minorities; sponsors terrorism; and speaks openly about the need to annihilate another sovereign state. As such, Iran is a country that cannot be trusted with nuclear weapons.

Comment

Even if Iran were never to launch a single nuclear warhead, merely its capacity to do so would provide the regime with a protective shield, emboldening it to continue and intensify its pursuit of regional hegemony and global instability. Iran has undoubtedly paid close attention to its ally, North Korea, which has deftly pioneered the path to political ascension through nuclear intimidation.

The essential menace emanating from Iran is, therefore, a result, not of its nuclear technology, but of its ideological convictions. Iran was a global concern prior to its nuclear advances, and will continue to be so in the aftermath of any nuclear deal – regardless of the terms.

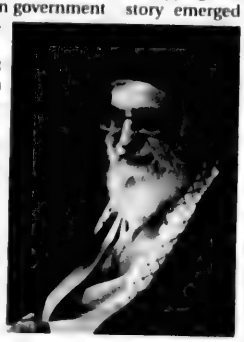
Senator David Tkachuk underscored this point to the Canadian Senate last week, when he spoke about the Islamic Republic of Iran's intimate relationship with terrorism. He drew attention to Iran's nine-digit budget line to support international terrorism, and the ideological context of the regime's embrace of terrorist diplomacy.

Tkachuk is the same Conservative senator who played a central role in the passage of the Justice for Victims of Terrorism Act (JVTA), a bill enabling victims of terror to file civil lawsuits against the sponsors and perpetrators of terrorism, and leading to the government's designation of Iran and Syria as state sponsors of terror. Canadians would be fortunate indeed if Tkachuk's statement last week is a prelude to greater action taken by the Canadian government with regard to Iranian terrorism.

Experts have noted that Iran regards terrorism as an essential element of its foreign policy, military strategy and religious revolution. Responsibility for executing this terrorism policy has largely been delegated to Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC) and its overseas branch, the Quds Force, which maintain operations in dozens of countries. The IRGC is currently assisting Bashar Assad in slaughtering thousands of Syrian civilians, and has been involved in terrorist attacks around the globe in which Canadian citizens have been murdered. Notably, the IRGC also provided assistance to the Taliban and Al Qaeda during the post-9/11 mission in Afghanistan in which so many Canadian soldiers were injured or killed.

Hamas and Hezbollah, both of which are listed terrorist entities in Canada, have received critical support from the IRGC. Hezbollah, in fact, has been referred to as nothing less than a wholly owned Iranian subsidiary, and a terrorist group currently more dangerous than Al Qaeda. This is an organization that seeks operatives with Canadian passports, extorts money from Lebanese expatriates in Canada, and has been caught conducting surveillance of Jewish and Israeli targets in Canada.

Hezbollah's Canadian presence is just one manifestation of Iran's interest in this country. The regime has attempted to extend its influence in Canada by surreptitiously funding conferences, mosques, university student organizations and cultural centres. Iranian-Canadians have often feared that speaking out against the regime will mean harm accruing to themselves or their families back in Iran.



Ayatollah Ali Khamenei

Iranian diplomats were, in fact, expelled from Canada in 2012, partly due to their spying on Canadians of Iranian origin. But the spying continues. A sensational news story emerged this month about Arian Azarbar, an alleged Iranian spy whose movements and activities were being monitored by Canadian security, intelligence and immigration officials. While Azarbar denies any connection to Iran, security expert Tom Quiggin has pointed out that the name of Azarbar's Canadian-based company figures prominently in a series of videos promoting an Iran-Venezuela business co-operation project in housing. More information will surely emerge in the coming weeks.

In the meantime, there is every indication that Iran's commitment to terrorism will remain unchanged. Accordingly, Canada should consider legislative and policy options to contend with that threat.

For one, the IRGC as a whole should be designated as a terrorist entity. Currently only the IRGC's Quds Force is listed as such. Yet in the past, Canada has wisely refused to recognize the legitimacy of any branch of a terrorist entity, and has banned groups like Hamas and Hezbollah in their entirety. The same measure should now be taken against the IRGC.

As noted by Emanuele Ottolenghi, a specialist on the IRGC, "The revenues derived from all [the IRGC's] activities fund their military endeavours – including support for terrorist groups abroad and the pursuit of nuclear weapons and ballistic missile technology at home."

Moreover, sanctions under the Special Economic Measures Act could be imposed for Iran's terrorist involvement, rather than solely for violations of its international nuclear obligations.

Finally, Canadians should press their government to maintain existing sanctions until there is verifiable evidence that Iran is not building a nuclear weapon. And legislators like David Tkachuk and Liberal member of Parliament Irwin Cotler deserve to be supported in their efforts to bring attention to an Iranian regime that has truly earned the distinction of being the pre-eminent state sponsor of global terrorism.

Film on oldest survivor wins Oscar

JTA

A documentary about the world's oldest Holocaust survivor won an Oscar one week after she died.

Alice Herz-Sommer, right, who died in London on Feb. 23 at the age of 110, was the subject of The Lady in Number 6: Music Saved My Life, which won the Academy Award for documentary short Sunday night.

The Prague-born Herz-Sommer, a concert pianist, was a prisoner in Theresienstadt. In accepting the Oscar, the film's director, Montrealer Malcolm Clarke, said that he was struck by Herz-Sommer's "extraordinary capacity for joy" and "amazing capacity for forgiveness."

Haredi men rally against military draft

JTA

JERUSALEM — Hundreds of thousands of haredi Orthodox men gathered at the entrance to Jerusalem to protest a bill that would require yeshiva students to serve in the military.

The main haredi factions were represented at what was dubbed the "million man protest." The March 2 protest did not have any speeches, just prayers and psalms. Police estimated the crowd at 300,000; protest organizers said it was 500,000.

More than 3,500 police and security personnel were at the site of the demonstration to protect the protesters. The main entrance to Jerusalem was closed to traffic at 1 p.m.; the Jerusalem Central Bus Station closed at 2:30 p.m.

Naftali Bennett, head of the Jewish Home party, made up mostly of modern Orthodox members, called on his party members to stay away from the rally.

"You won't find any mention of criminal sanctions in the bill," Bennett said Saturday night. "Those who shout that they need to speak out know that no yeshiva student will be sent to jail. The bill is fair. Military service is not an edict, it's a mitzvah."

Under the proposed military draft law being prepared by the Shaked Committee, haredi men would be criminally charged for evading the draft, but the penalties would not go into effect until 2017. In addition, draft orders for haredi men up to age 26 will not go into effect until up to a year after the law is implemented.

The measure is likely to be brought before the Knesset plenum this month.

The Tal Law, which allowed haredi men to defer army service indefinitely, was invalidated by the Supreme Court in February 2012 and expired in August that year. Haredi yeshiva students since then have had their drafts deferred.

On March 1, modern Orthodox leader Rabbi Haim Druckman called on his community to stay away from the rally.

Another rabbinic leader of the movement, Rabbi Yehoshua Shapira, head of the Ramat Gan yeshiva, changed his mind on the day of the protest regarding participation in the rally, saying that movement leaders would not attend despite announcing their intent last week to join the rally. Expressions of disrespect by the haredi Orthodox community toward the modern Orthodox reportedly was the reason for the change of heart, according to Israel National News, a modern Orthodox news service.

The Belz chassidic sect has threatened to leave Israel en masse if the law is passed.
